March Runoff Into Missouri River Double Normal Rate

OMAHA, Neb. — The March runoff into the Missouri River reservoirs from this winter's heavy snow and ice was more than double the normal rate, but well-below normal snow in the mountains will result in much less runoff through July.

"System storage is forecast to top 60 million acre feet (MAF) this month for the first time since 1999," said Jody Farhat, chief of the Water Management Office. "However, the lack of mountain snow means storage will peak and begin to decline earlier than normal."

The mountain snowpack is only 73 percent of normal for this time of the year, 73 percent of normal above Fort Peck and 74 percent in the reach between Fort Peck and Garrison, essentially the Yellowstone River basin. Traditionally, 96 percent of the peak accumulation occurs by April 1.

Runoff for 2010 is currently forecast to total 26 MAF, 105 percent of normal.

The March pulse of water from Gavins Point Dam to benefit the endangered pallid sturgeon was cancelled because of high downstream river levels. A pulse will be conducted in the period May 1-19, depending on downstream river levels, water temperature below Gavins Point and nesting activity by the endangered least terns and threatened piping plovers. Downstream flow limits are in place to reduce or eliminate the pulse if river levels are too high.

Gavins Point releases averaged 15,000 cubic per second (cfs) in March. The long-term average is 19,700 cfs. Releases are forecast to average 15,000 cfs in April as the river downstream of Sioux City continues to fall below the flood stages experienced last month. They will be increased in May to provide flows for navigation and other downstream uses.

Fort Randall reservoir rose 12 feet last month due to extremely high local runoff, ending March at elevation 1361 feet. It will climb 3.4 feet in April, ending the month near elevation 1364.4 feet.
