work group. "I've worked in -22 degrees, not counting wind chill, up to 120 degrees, and everywhere in between."

That's why safety is such an important competence for students to master.

"This is kind of a dangerous occupation," said Iowa Lakes Community College's Darin Moeller. "You're working 200 feet up in the air. You're dealing with high voltage that has its risks involved."

Iowa Lakes established one of the country's first community college wind technician programs with 15 students in 2004.

The school was thinking of installing a turbine to save on utility costs when administrators learned of the industry's need for trained technicians, said Moeller, executive dean of the Iowa Lakes Estherville Campus.

The program has since grown to accept 102 new students each fall.

Some students earn a one-year certificate, while most will stay for a second year to get an associate of applied science degree. Graduates can earn $35,000 to $40,000 in an entry-level position, Moeller said.

AWEA estimates that one wind technician is needed to service every 10 megawatts of installed wind generating capacity. That translates to 700 new wind technicians needed in 2009 to keep pace with new wind farm installations.

The worldwide recession slowed some of the industry's fast growth, but that need is not going away, Moeller said.

"The long-term need for technicians appears to be there," he said. "We're just in a little bit of a slump right now with some hiring, probably just because of the economy."

In the summer of 2008, Columbia Gorge hosted a meeting of 18 colleges and universities, seven wind companies and AWEA staff members to come up with a draft set of skills. The guidelines will be completed this year.

Educational and industry leaders decided to go with a seal of approval at this stage rather than a national certification program.

"Each one of the companies has to train those new employees anyway to the very turbine-specific things that are of a proprietary nature that we can't be teaching," Wolff said. "So they didn't feel that a national certification was quite needed yet."

Technology in the industry changes fast.

Columbia Gorge started its wind technician training program in the fall of 2007, and it's already looking at the fourth major change of its curriculum, Wolff said.

Iowa Lakes also has needed to adjust its program over time. "It's one of those changing technologies that if you're standing still, you're probably falling behind," Moeller said.

75 YEARS AGO

Friday, April 12, 1935
 • An official communique stated today that Germany had informed Great Britain, France and Italy that she is ready to enter an eastern European pact of non-aggression even if some other signatories "stipulate among themselves accords of reciprocal assistance."

• A number of House Republicans prepared today for a concerted attack against the administration's social security bill on the grounds that it would do no good and that its tax burdens would increase unemployment.

50 YEARS AGO

Tuesday, April 12, 1960
 • Army engineers meeting at Jefferson City, Mo., said development of a series of locks and dams on the lower Missouri River could provide tremendous recreational opportunities.

• An insurgent band led by a former Castro officer was reported bottled up in the Sierra Maestra Mountains of eastern Cuba today, but the government refused to talk about it.

25 YEARS AGO

Friday, April 12, 1985
 • Low commodity prices and uncertainty about future farm policy have led South Dakota farmers to take 1.2 million acres of wheat land and almost 900,000 acres of corn land out of production this spring.

• Space shuttle Discovery thundered into orbit today, carrying Sen. Jake Garn among its seven-member crew on a much-delayed mission that blasted off with just one minute to spare.
