City of Yankton Posts New Informational Trail Signs

The city of Yankton has posted new trailhead markers for users of the Auld-Brokaw trail.

The markers and signs include a trail map, trail information, and educational materials for the attached brochure holder. They come to the city from the South Dakota Department of Health and its HealthySD program. Funding was provided by a federal Communities Putting Prevention to Work grant through the American Reinvestment and Recovery Act. The intent is to identify and encourage the use of local trails as a way to increase physical activity.

"The Auld-Brokaw trail is a real asset to our community and we're pleased that we could add this signage to help promote it and at the same time, encourage physical activity for our residents and visitors," said Todd Larson, director of Parks and Recreation.

Regular physical activity can reduce the risk of high blood pressure, diabetes, colon cancer and coronary heart disease.

It also helps control weight, improve overall quality of life and reduce symptoms of anxiety and depression. Federal health guidelines recommend adults get at least 150 minutes of moderate-intensity physical activity each week, or 75 minutes of vigorous-intensity activity per week.

"Many South Dakota communities have started on the path to wellness and a healthy lifestyle by establishing walking, hiking, and biking trails," said Linda Ahrendt, administrator of Health Promotion for the Department of Health. "These markers and signs are a great way to recognize those trails and promote their use."

South Dakotans can find more information about local trails and health education on the department's www.HealthySD.gov website at the community section.
