shipped from long distances are also being conducted.

The participants were from a three-state area and just as varied. There were farmers, a home gardener, school lunch workers, bakers, and food manufacturers, all interested in learning about new ways to produce local food stuffs which in turn could be marketed to school lunch programs.

"Childhood obesity is on the increase and we believe environmental and policy changes are key reasons for this situation," said Chelsey Erpelding, Farm to School Coordinator and member of the Center for Nutrition. "In Douglas County, childhood obesity has risen to 28.4 percent, and in low-income areas, the obesity of young people is as high as 46 percent."

Erpelding is working hard to bring local farmers into the equation so fresh fruit and vegetables can be offered to the children of Douglas County. Through the Farm and School Program she is trying to educate schools about the nutritional differences in the fresh food stuffs.

Working and educating farmers for the Farm to School program is also necessary. Farmers need to get their Good Agricultural Practices (GAP) certification to make sure the food is cleaned and processed safely. The GAP certification has guidelines which make sure the food is safely cleaned and edible for school students to eat and it also protects the farmers from selling tainted food stuffs. Along with GAP training and certification, the farmers are also required to have a certain level of liability insurance to participate in the program.

The program will increase the opportunity of fresh fruits and vegetables in the school lunch serving line. Although there are barriers, there seems to be interest at all levels Erpelding said. A needs assessment for food items was sent out to food services, distributors and producers and positive comments came back to the Center for Nutrition.

"We need to see more fresh fruit and vegetable offerings in high poverty areas," said Beverly Benes, director of Nutrition Services and the Nebraska Department of Education. "There is also a need to increase farmers markets in these lower income areas." Many studies are being conducted about adding fresh fruit in school lunches. Commodity stores in the poverty areas would also be a positive development.

In low-income areas, individuals sometimes don't travel over ten miles for food Benes said. They will shop at the closest convenience store just around the corner. Changing sales and marketing so in low poverty areas in suburbia healthy choices like bread and fruit would be provided at the front of the convenience store would be a positive step.

Benes talked about several upcoming grant opportunities which could be used to provide the GAP training to familiarize farmers with the program requirements so food safety in schools is continued. Equipment purchases may qualify and also the development of planning and partnerships could be organized.

Central City has a successful Farm to School Program thanks to food service director Joyce Rice. "A long time ago I could see the needs of having the availability of fresh food in the school lunch program," said Rice.

She went to the state of Nebraska and discussed what the requirements would be necessary and what guidelines would be needed.

"Along the way, I made mistakes," said Rice with a laugh. "Do you know how large a bin of watermelons is? Well, I didn't either but we got rid of them and none spoiled." The state recommended a washing station be installed in her kitchen so the local producers could bring the fresh fruits and vegetables there to be cleaned.

Rice has done surveys in her district. In a six-week survey, her students ate 199 percent more fresh fruit and vegetables than when she used the canned foodstuffs. She educated the students by displaying maps of where the fresh foodstuffs she was using that day were grown.

"One producer brought his asparagus in, he washed it, cooked it and even served it to the students and told them all about the new vegetable," said Rice. "We required each student to take one piece of asparagus and 85 percent of the students at least tried it and many asked for more. I know because I cleaned the trays and kept track of the waste."

Rice advises baby steps. She tries to have at least one fresh item every day. The short growing season in this region may offer some difficulties but Rice's philosophy is to offer the fresh fruit and produce to students within 24 hours of harvesting. She laughs about the challenges in the small two-stop light central Nebraska town. Many students didn't realize pumpkins could be used for more than making jack-o-lanterns. They come back for more muffins and cookies.

"We are looking for farmers to participate in this program because when it gets ramped up, we will have to work hard to have the sources to meet the needs," said William Powers of Nebraska Food Coop in West Point and also the Nebraska Sustainable Ag Society.

Two of the participants were from the Thompson Food Service of Grand Island.

"It only makes sense we be part of this new development," said Paul Maciejewski, a representative from the food service provider present for the workshop who distributes food products to schools and restaurants. "We need to start looking for available sources so we can make it available to the schools."

The afternoon session opened up to allow the participants to do some strategic planning for getting from point A to point B. Starkweather challenged the food specialists to answer questions about how to work together and where to go from here.

"Let's pretend we have $5 in our pocket and our Montana family wants to have a special evening," said Starkweather. "We are all familiar with the budget crunch going on right now, so this is the time to be creative."

"We had to look across the state of South Dakota," added board member Jim Fitzgerald. "We have no idea where the state government is going to go with funding. If you take the last two years, rather than following state law and giving 3 percent or the rate of inflation, whichever is less, we had a 0 percent increase this year and a 6.6 percent cut for next year with no idea what the future holds. Even assuming that funding returns to the 3 percent or inflation model, we are showing that in six years, we would need the full $4.175 million. Rather than do a shorter time frame and then have to come back to the public in five years, we chose to pursue a 10-year opt-out."

The board members also emphasized that the Yankton School District has a long history of being responsible with tax payers' money.

"It should be clear to our district patrons that we have been and will continue to be a fiscally responsible district," Specht said. "For the last 15-20 years, since the changes to how funding schools was started under the Janklow administration, we have done our very best to be the most fiscally responsible district in the state. We were the district that everyone else pointed to as an example how to run a school. The opt-out did not come out of the blue. We have been seeing it coming, we were hoping to avoid it for another 1-2 years, but because of the cuts at the state level, we could not avoid it any longer."

When the board members were asked if they had considered options other than an opt-out — including eliminating busing, athletics and activities — they said that while they had looked at it as an option, they had decided that the negatives outweighed any potential monetary gains made by the district.

"We have the concern we would lose students to other districts," Ailts said. "At $4,800 per student in state aid funding, it doesn't take long to lose any advantages you may have gained."

Specht added, "We currently bus around 375 students. If 113 transfer out, that is a net loss of $500,000 for the district in revenue, not to mention what it would do to the community."

Because the district is facing a slowly declining enrollment number, it was asked if there is the potential of closing one of the district's four elementary schools. However, because the students being lost are spread out across all grades, board members said they do not feel the other schools could comfortably absorb the number of students it would require to make the option feasible.

When the meeting was over, the board members all felt that it had been very productive.

"Anytime you can have a setting where questions and concerns can be addressed, it is a good thing," Specht said. "This was a great evening in we were able to answer a large number of questions. Anytime you can have a dialog with a group this large, it is a good thing. Hopefully, we were able to address the majority of the issues that those in attendance wanted answers on."

Specht added, even though the results of the opt-out referendum will not be known until the end of May, the board still must present its preliminary 2011-2012 budget at the May 9 school board meeting.

"We have to go forward with our budget using the numbers as they stand right now," he said. "If the opt-out does pass, we will adjust the budget prior to the July school board meeting. No matter what, this is an ongoing issue that the district needs to deal with. As the elected school board, we are doing our best to make the right decisions for the school — to do what is best for our students and give them the education that they deserve."

If members of the public were unable to attend the opt-out forum, the Press and Dakotan recorded the meeting and is available for viewing at www.yankton.net.

In addition, the Yankton School District has created a website where information pertaining to the opt-out is available including the handout prepared for Tuesday night's forum at www.ykd.k12.sd.us.

Board President Mike Stevens was not present at the forum because of a recent heart surgery.

Ala. Switches Drug For Execution

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — Alabama announced Tuesday that it was switching out a key drug used in lethal injections earlier than expected, a move that will be challenged by a condemned inmate scheduled to die in less than a month.

Like several other states, Alabama has turned over its supply of sodium thiopental to the Drug Enforcement Administration after questions were raised about how and where the states received the drug. The drug pentobarbital will now be used as part of the state's three-drug execution cocktail instead of sodium thiopental, Alabama prisons spokesman Brian Corbett said.

The change comes after attorneys for death row inmate Jason Oric Williams wrote U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder, asking the federal government to investigate whether Alabama's supply of sodium thiopental was illegally obtained from Tennessee. That states supply of the drug has also been seized by the DEA.

At least 10 states have switched to pentobarbital or are considering a switch as part of their three-drug methods because of a nationwide shortage of sodium thiopental, a sedative that states used for more than three decades until its only U.S. manufacturer stopped making it in 2009 and then dropped plans to resume production earlier this year.

Alabama has used sodium thiopental since switching from the electric chair in 2002.

An attorney for Williams said he will ask the courts to stop Williams' May 19 execution because the state is changing the drug. "The state should not be able to make up on the fly how it is going to carry out executions," Bryan Stevenson said.
