Tornado Shelters Being Built In South, Midwest

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — When deadly twisters chewed through the South and Midwest in 2011, thousands of people in the killers' paths had nowhere to hide. Now many of those families are taking an unusual extra step to be ready next time: adding tornado shelters to their homes.

A year after the storms, sales of small residential shelters known as safe rooms are surging across much of the nation, especially in hard-hit communities such as Montgomery and Tuscaloosa in Alabama and in Joplin, Mo., where twisters laid waste to entire neighborhoods.

Manufacturers can barely keep up with demand, and some states are offering grants and other financial incentives to help pay for the added protection and peace of mind.

Tom Cook didn't need convincing. When a 2008 tornado barreled toward his home in rural southwest Missouri, Cook, his wife and their teenage daughter sought refuge in a bathroom. It wasn't enough. His wife was killed.

Cook moved to nearby Joplin to rebuild, never imagining he would confront another monster twister. But he had a safe room installed in the garage just in case.

much of it to the big box retailer.

Sales tax revenue was up 10.2 percent in April 2005 compared to April 2004, and even higher numbers followed: 11.6 percent in May; 12 percent in June; and 17.9 percent in July. In August, the revenue increase would slip to 2.5 percent before reaching a negative 2.7 percent in September.

"I've got to believe with the new Menards we'll be up at least 6 percent for (2012)," Viereck said. "We had some strong figures last year, so when we start comparing, it will be hard. But I just can't see any reason why it wouldn't be at least 6 percent."

In 2011, City of Yankton sales tax revenue was up more than 8 percent compared to 2010.

According to statistics released Friday by the South Dakota Department of Labor, the March unemployment rate in Yankton was at 4.9 percent. With a labor force of 7,545, 375 individuals were unemployed.

The March figure was
