hours looking for something wrong," Appel said.

Being Springsteen's manager, he said, "You had to be a psychologist, you had to be everything."

As he started the tour, the album went into production.

Carlin writes that it was the first day of Springsteen's two-day stand at Kutztown when Appel showed up at the band's hotel with the acetate pressing of "Born to Run" and gathered the band to listen as he played the disc on the portable record player.

Which hotel it was is lost to history. The book doesn't name it, and Appel said he didn't stay there, and doesn't remember.

But Appel says Steven Van Zandt, Springsteen's longtime confidant and guitarist, had just joined Springsteen's E Street Band — it might have been his first show — and was there. So was the rest of the band and Appel's brother, Stephen, then serving as Springsteen's road manager, Appel said.

Carlin writes that when the last notes of the final song, "Jungleland," faded out, "the band whooped, applauded and reached out to slap hands." He writes that Stephen Appel "noticed that his big brother's eyes glistened with tears."

"Relief seemed to blow in through the open window," Carlin writes.

But Carlin writes that Springsteen grumbled, "I dunno. I'd do things differently," then "jumped to his feet, snatched the acetate from the turntable, and stalked out to the hotel courtyard, where he flung it into the swimming pool."

Over a two-page passage, Carlin writes that Springsteen declared “the entire project a waste of time. A cruel satire of rock ‘n’ roll.” Even after a call from Springsteen’s then friend and producer (and later manager) Jon Landau, the singer remained unconvinced.

Finally, the book says, Appel shook his head and said, "Let's scrap the whole thing." He told Springsteen he'd break the news to Columbia Records' Lundvall the next morning, release the single "Born to Run" as a stopgap, then rerecord the songs.

The book says Springsteen, his girlfriend and the Appel brothers all piled into Mike Appel's car and started on the two-hour drive back to New York City to scrap the project.

It says they were halfway there when, after apparently cooling off during the drive, Springsteen started to laugh, and by the time they got to New York had "shrugged off the last six torturous hours with the wave of the hand."

"Then again," the book quotes Springsteen as saying, "let's just let it ride."

Appel's account in the phone call differs somewhat. He said Springsteen, indeed, criticized virtually everything about the album, saying he "wasn't excited about anything we did except (the song) 'Born to Run.'" "

Appel says saxophonist Clarence Clemons left the room when Springsteen insulted his playing. The rest of the band followed, Appel said.

But Appel said he remembers the songs as being on a tape, not an acetate — but Springsteen did toss it in the pool.

The biggest difference in Appel's account was that there was no car trip to New York. Appel says Springsteen backed down in that hotel room.

"I'm in the room, and I'm standing there and Bruce says this," Appel said.

Frustrated, he said he told Springsteen, "If you really feel that, just tell Columbia Records they'll have to scrap the album and we'll start over. All you have to do is write eight or nine more songs as good as 'Jungleland' or 'Thunder Road.'"

"And when I said it, I actually meant it. Bruce had been around me a few years, and he realized that. He got that sense that I was nuts to even think of the monumental task of doing 'Born to Run' in the first place. Bruce Springsteen felt Mike Appel was crazier than him."

According to Appel, Springsteen replied "I guess it is done, isn't it?"

"Bruce was The Boss," Appel said, referring to Springsteen's nickname. "But it was so frightening what I actually said, that he threw in the towel. That's how 'Born to Run' actually was finished."

The book doesn't say whether the incident took place before or after Springsteen's July 25, 1975, concert at Kutztown, but Appel remembers it as happening after the afternoon sound check but before the show.

"It was such an enormous psychic load, it was untenable," Appel said of Springsteen's reaction to the first listen of "Born to Run." "He couldn't possibly digest it.

"And then he went out and played a great show. The albatross that was 'Born to Run' actually was lifted."
