the way, Neuharth decided they should sit down for a rest, just about the time the general was coming by in a jeep.

"It was Patton, and he said, 'Who's in charge here?' " Cal Neuharth recounted. "Al said, 'I am.' And Patton screamed, 'Get these ... Krauts back to the compound or you'll be in the same place they are.' "

His cousin regaled him with many stories like that on his many visits to Eureka. But their reunions weren't just tied to South Dakota. Cal Neuharth is a diehard Boston Red Sox fan. Al Neuharth, on the other hand, had a lifelong love affair with the New York Yankees.

There were several occasions when the newspaper magnate flew his South Dakota kin to Yankee Stadium to sit in a luxury box and watch a little baseball.

"One day, he introduces me to George Steinbrenner," Cal Neuharth said. "He says, 'George, this is Cal Neuharth from South Dakota.' George got up, shook my hand and said, 'What the hell, two of you from South Dakota?' He thought half the state was there."

And it wasn't just Steinbrenner in that box. Cal Neuharth said actor Billy Crystal often would talk to him. And he met newsman Dan Rather and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger.

"Al's plane had mechanical failure once, so his driver took me up to the box," Cal Neuharth said. "This guy in front of me is yapping, and he turns around, sticks out his hand and says, 'I'm Donald Trump. Who are you?' "

The fact was, he was Cal Neuharth from Eureka, S.D. Perhaps the Donald knew his cousin. He was a famous South Dakotan who didn't let the spotlight blind him from finding his way back home.

"He was quite a guy," Cal Neuharth said Friday.

"We're going to miss him."

Book

demic and scholarly work that is being done at a college in their backyard.

The book is in collaboration with two other nationally recognized professors. Sara Goering is a professor at the University of Washington and the director of the Northwest Center for Philosophy for Children. Thomas Waternberg is a professor at Mount Holyoke College and has an award-winning website that contains information on philosophy for K-12 schools.

"The Philosophy for Children (P4C) is a movement that tries to get more philosophical thinking and skills into K-12 schools," Shudak said. "It's a pretty sizable movement that has been going on for around the last 30 years. One of the difficulties it has faced is when people ask questions like, 'How do you do it and what do the models look like?'"

He added that philosophy is an eternal and enduring conversation about questions that have been asked for thousands of years on the subjects of justice, goodness and beauty. He said there is already numerous topics in K-12 curriculum that revolves around those questions.

"The questions then become, how can we help teachers look at their already existing curriculum a little bit more philosophically?" Shudak said. "Most of what teachers do is already philosophically-laden, so these topics exist all around them."

He added that one way teachers can get philosophy into the classroom is through literature groups when talking about protagonists and antagonists. The philosophical aspect of this would be why are these people in disagreements.

"It's important because these philosophical thinking skills help go deeper into questions of everyday life," Shudak said. "It's not always one answer, and sometimes there isn't an answer. It's just a way of going deeper into questions."

He noted that kids are naturally disposed to wonder, enjoy puzzles and play, and if educators can take the ancient saying that philosophy begins in wonder seriously, then it makes sense that there can be better efforts made to bring students in contact with philosophy.

"Teachers talk about the importance of critical and creative thinking, and about the necessity of 21st century skills, and philosophy is a wonderful midwife for making those things happen in classrooms," Shudak said. "This book brings together K-12 educators, teacher educators and trained philosophers who discuss and describe their efforts at making curriculum a bit more philosophical — there is really a bit of everything in this volume."
