Daily opinions from the P&D Sports Staff on local and national high school, college and professional sports.

News spread around the country on Monday after NBA center Jason Collins, most recently of the Washington Wizards, announced publicly that he is a homosexual. At least publicly, many people showed their support for the 34-year-old veteran.

What the announcement and the reaction show, though, is that we, as a society, still have a ways to go in order to be completely free of prejudice.

While I am a practicing Catholic, my beliefs stray from the church in this aspect: as far as I am concerned, how you live your life — as long as it does not harm others — is none of my concern. If I am your friend, that friendship will not end just because you tell me that you are a gay or lesbian. (I have friends who I have remained close with even after they "came out.") I also am not going to change my opinion of how you are as an employee or an athlete based on your sexual orientation — or your gender, your race or religious beliefs.

There are — and will — be people who see things different. They will not see a man trying to live his life, but someone who should be feared, or worse, despised for being something other than what they are. We saw the same thing last century as Jackie Robinson broke baseball's color barrier, then again as Hank Aaron broke Babe Ruth's career home run record.

Collins obviously felt that our world was ready enough to know his secret. Hopefully in the future, who a person is doesn't have to be kept a secret because of what he or she does for a living.

But we still have a long way to go.

Slive has some experience on selection committees since he is a former chair of the panel that picks the NCAA men's basketball tournament field.
