Vermillion Recognized For Drinking Water Compliance

PIERRE — The South Dakota Department of Environment and Natural Resources (DENR) announced that the City of Vermillion public water system and the system's operation specialists have been awarded a Secretary's Award for Drinking Water Excellence. The system's operations specialists are Randy Isaacson, Thomas Kruse, Wade Mount, Allen Clark, Curt Haakinson, Dale Husby, Shane Griese and Tyler Zimmerman of the Vermillion Water Department and Fred Balleweg of the Vermillion Waste Water Department. "Safe, high quality drinking water supports a higher quality of life," said DENR Secretary Steve Pirner. "DENR is proud to honor the City of Vermillion and their operation specialists who supplied to their customers high quality water that met all the requirements of the Safe Drinking Water Act for 14 consecutive years." To qualify for the Secretary's Award for Drinking Water Excellence, public water systems and their system operations specialists had to meet all of the following requirements for ten consecutive years or more:

- compliance monitoring and reporting,
- drinking water standards, and
- certification requirements.

ON THIS DATE

- 75 YEARS AGO
Monday, April 1, 1940
• Today is the day you keep your fingers crossed, doubt everything you hear and read and look out for wooden nickels. For it is All Fool's Day, traditionally a time when everyone is entitled to try and make a sucker out of everyone else, and avoid being made one if possible.
• Work was started today by the city leveling off the old city dump site preparatory to laying out an athletic park and baseball ground. It is located on the Missouri river bank at the foot of Pearl and Mulberry streets.

Autism

THOMAS
Lane's family has been personally affected by the disease. Her grandson, Thomas, was diagnosed with autism at the age 4. "Up until he was 18 months old, he was perfect," Lane said. "He could walk, and he was starting to talk — but then his whole world changed. He could say words here and there, but he really never talked again until he was almost 5." Lane's sisters pointed out there was something wrong with Thomas. "When we found out, it was just devastating," she said. Lane had worked at Ability Learning Services (ABS) in Yankton with a very severely autistic child, — so she knew what the disease was, and the side-effects that it could have. "The child I worked with would always be rocking back and forth and shaking his hands all the time," she said. "I thought, 'No. Please, he can't have that. He just can't.' It was really hard. Though Thomas has great parents, it took my daughter-in-law and son a really long time to accept it. (Lary and I) accepted it before they did." But with Thomas's diagnosis came many surprises.

Lane recalled taking Thomas to a restaurant before he turned 5. A waiter came up and asked him what he wanted to eat. "He ordered right off the menu," Lane said. "We thought he was just saying what he liked, so we made him read it. He could read the whole kids menu to us. None of us had a clue that he could read because he never said anything." But according to Lane, you couldn't tell Thomas was that way if you met him now. "Now he just talks all the time," she chuckled. Thomas, who is now in middle school, has a high functioning form of autism known as Aspergers, which is a pervasive developmental disorder (PDD). This is a group of conditions that involve delays in the development of many basic skills, most notably the ability to socialize with others, to communicate and to use imagination. "He is very high functioning," Lane said. "He is an honor roll student and isn't behavioral. He doesn't have to take any medication, so we are really lucky. One of the main things he still does because of his autism is (stimming)." Stimming, or self-stimulation, is the repetition of physical movements, sounds or repetitive movement of objects common in individuals with developmental disabilities. Stimming is most prevalent in people with autistic spectrum disorders. It is a way in which people with autism can calm themselves. "But he can control it in school," Lane said. "At school, they allow him to leave the classroom when he is getting frustrated so he doesn't have a meltdown. The school system he is in is just wonderful." Lane said Thomas mostly does his stimming at home when he gets to be in his own space. "He is really doing well," she chuckled. "He is a lot of fun. He used to come out to our house for the weekend every two weeks up until this year. He told me, 'I'm in middle school now and I'm too busy.' He has outgrown grandma just like any normal teenager. He even has that teenage attitude coming out."

FOR THE CAUSE
Lane started making bars to sell for charity in 2008, after Thomas was diagnosed with autism, for the "Walk Now For Autism" event. "When he was first diagnosed, I would raise almost $2,500 a year just for autism," she said. "I make everything homemade, and I make everything. I buy all the ingredients and I don't take any money back. I don't only donate my time, but my money." Besides autism, Lane has donated the money to many different organizations. According to Lane, the bars have been very popular over the years. "There will be people that know that I do this, so they just stop in for bars every Wednesday," she said. "There are some people that even buy sacks of them." Lane said she does it all for the cause. "Thomas is the only grandchild I have," she said. "He means everything in this world to my husband and I. Autism has such a wide spectrum. There are so many people out there that have it — whether you know it or not. We just want to make people aware of autism."
