order to make it more memorable for the audience.

"I had been playing in a group at that time called Vicious Rumor, a hard rock band, and we didn't have a lot of dates on the calendar," he said. "I came across another band that was doing more variety, more entertaining. I was sitting down at the table with several of the members at that time and we were discussing coming up with an image that people would remember and enjoy so we could go at it with more variety to be more entertaining. I just jokingly said we should call ourselves 'The Nerds.' I was looking at a National Inquirer article about nerds or something. I said, 'We should call ourselves The Nerds and play it to the hilt.'"

He added that as soon as he said it, he knew that was what the band needed to do, even if everyone else in the band was very doubtful.

"Everyone else was kind of like, 'You are really off your rocker now,'" Blue said. "I was convinced it would work, and after a couple of months of shows, I was really convinced."

In 1994, the band changed its name to The Dweebs after finding out that a band from New Jersey, owned the trademark on using The Nerds.

"That was my introduction to trademark law," Blue said. "We did a search on the Dweebs. That was available, so we obtained the rights to that."

The Dweebs have never looked back. Averaging 130 concerts a year, the band is in high demand. This weekend alone they will be in Whitehall, Wis., tonight (Friday), Yankton Saturday night and Goodview Minn., on Sunday.

"This is probably the most miles we will put on in one weekend, but I remember one time we did three shows in 18 hours," Blue said. "Des Moines, Iowa, in the evening, Eau Claire, Wis., the next afternoon and St. Paul, Minn., that evening."

Blue said that because of the variety of shows that the band does - corporate events, weddings, nightclubs, festivals and fairs - they don't play the same songs at every show.

"It really depends on the show and location," Blue said. "We have a song list that we tentatively go by, but I will change it up during the show. I am kind of like a crazy coach in that way: I don't hesitate to throw in an audible. We have hand signals so I can change up the lineup and we know which song is next. We look at the audience response and go according to that." For more information about The Dweebs, visit www.thedweebs.com.

insisted that we rehearse and play them in real time. Without all that stop and start, you really get the opportunity to play, to really get things going, to establish the rhythm.

"But I don't know if I could have done it if I'd not been in the theater for so many years," he said.

Most of his rehearsal time was devoted to the farmhouse scene, Waltz recalled.

"For other scenes, not so much," he said. "Quentin didn't want to establish a form of security. He didn't want us too comfortable. He wanted to keep everyone on our toes."

"So after that opening scene, we talked and rehearsed a bit, but not too much. He wanted us to surprise him."

A longtime resident of London, Waltz is fluent in German, French and English. But he's modest about it: "Where I come from, that's nothing to write home about."

Suddenly a hot property with casting agents around the world, Waltz is in negotiations to take over the lead role in "Tatort," a long-running hit on German public television not unlike "Law & Order" in the United States.
