WATER

drought over the way the corps operates the Missouri River system. The corps traditionally has retained water in upstream reservoirs and released it in the summer to maintain sufficient water levels for barge traffic. But the effects of a lingering drought on the upper Great Plains made lawsuits over Missouri River management a spring ritual.

Johnston said no federal lawsuits are pending, as Missouri River users are now pacified with plenty of water.

"What's happening is the same as what happened in 1993, when we had several years drought and the system refilled in a year and all was right with the world," Johnston said. "When everybody has all the water they need all the enthusiasm for fighting goes away."

North Dakota's Lake Sakakawea hit a record-low level in 2005 because of prolonged drought in the Missouri River Basin, threatening the fishery. The lake has risen more than 45 feet since then.

Kirby Morgenstern, owner of Morgy's Guide Service at the lake, said his business has picked up with the rising water.

"Everything is back to normal and the fishing has gotten a lot better," he said. "Until last year when the water started coming back, the fish on the lake were skinny and ugly. They're fantastic now, and the economy is going to come back out of this."

Jim Torgerson, who runs Lund's Landing, a marina and restaurant at the lake, said several businesses shuttered over the past decade due to low water.

"All of my neighbors who had small fishing businesses went down," he said. "Now the water's great, the fishing is great and people are buying boats."

In north-central Missouri, Agriservices of Brunswick LLC, bought its own barge to move grain and fertilizer after some shippers folded during the drought, said Lucy Fletcher, a company spokeswoman.

"When the water became unreliable, most barge lines pulled off the Missouri River," she said. "It's been hard — when they're holding water for recreation it's hard to rely on it for industry."

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., one of the biggest critics of the corps' management of the Missouri, has fought to hold releases in the upstream reservoirs to support fish reproduction and recreation.

Dorgan said a 1944 law setting out the purposes for the river's dams and reservoirs favors downstream barges, an industry he says "has shrunk to the size of a minnow."

Improvements Made At Michigan Oil Spill Site

TIM MARTIN Associated Press Writer

LANSING, Mich. — A regional administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency said Sunday that significant improvement had been made at the site of an oil spill in a southern Michigan river, but the agency cautioned that it will take months to complete the cleanup.

Those efforts, along with air and water quality monitoring, continue to increase along the affected stretch of the Kalamazoo River, EPA regional administrator Susan Hedman said during a media briefing in Marshall.

The oil flow was stopped and contained in a 25-mile stretch of the river from Marshall westward past Battle Creek. Several hundred workers are on crews along the river devoted to the cleanup.

"Containment is adequate now," said Mark Durno, the EPA's deputy incident commander. "Now it's a matter of recovery and removal of the remainder of the sheen and small patches of oil that remain on the Kalamazoo River."

The EPA estimates it will take weeks to get the oil out of the river and the flood plain. It could take several months to clean up the marshy area where the spill began near a creek that flows into the Kalamazoo River, the agency said.

Officials with Enbridge Inc., which owns the pipeline, estimated Sunday that the company had recovered slightly more than half the oil that had leaked.

Enbridge officials said they detected the leak July 26. Investigators are reviewing 911 calls to Marshall area fire departments made the previous evening by residents complaining of a strong gas odor to try and determine if the leak might have begun earlier.

The EPA estimates the spill at more than 1 million gallons of crude, while the Canadian company estimates the total at 820,000 gallons. The leak came from a 30-inch pipeline, which was built in 1969 and carries about 8 million gallons of oil daily from Griffith, Ind., to Sarnia, Ontario.

The cost of the cleanup hasn't been determined. Enbridge is responsible for the cleanup bill, including money that the EPA and other government agencies will spend on its response.

"Our goal is to return the river to the state it was in before this incident," Enbridge CEO Patrick D. Daniel said.

The EPA and other government officials have scheduled a public meeting for residents at Marshall's high school on Monday evening. A similar public hearing will be scheduled for Battle Creek residents later in the week.

The section of the pipeline where the leak occurred could be removed early this week. It's expected to be taken to a National Transportation Safety Board lab for testing to try and determine the cause of the incident.

Shallow water downstream dogged the barge industry, and only about half of the eight barge company's that began last decade survived, said Lynn Muench, a vice president of The American Waterways Operators, a St. Louis-based trade group for the towboat and barge industry.

This year is the first time in a decade that barges are able to haul full loads without worry of running aground, she said.

"The flows are happening and the lack of water is not something anyone is concerned about right now," Muench said. "But anyone who is sensible and reasonable knows the drought will come back."
