morality, on how to proceed."

Rezac explained that ASH care begins at birth and ends with compassionate care for end-of-life needs with their Majestic Bluffs and Yankton Care centers.

One question that was raised by the visiting Sisters concerned how the care provided was paid for and if ASHH was able to keep the mission of providing care to everyone, no matter their ability to pay.

"Last year, we provided more than $2.4 million in free services to more than 900 people," Rezac replied. "We also provided more than $2.4 million in free community services such as screenings."

Following the visit with Rezac, the group toured the Majestic Bluffs campus where they met with Tony Erickson, executive director of Senior Services for ASH.

"We don't have facilities like this," noted Sister Marian Mathew from India. "We will have people who come to the hospital and if they don't have room for them, they will sit in the halls. It is not unusual to see many people sitting in the halls."

For the Sisters visiting Yankton perhaps the most unusual aspect was how much space there was in the area.

"I am so used to walking down the street and rubbing shoulders with 100 people in the matter of a few blocks," said Sister Shobha D'Sami from India. "Here, you can walk and not see even one person."

Erickson said the goal of the Majestic Bluffs campus is to make sure that all residents of the facility are enabled to make their own decisions regarding services.

leader Osama bin Laden remains a primary goal.

He also said the Taliban leadership had detached itself from much of the fighting, occasionally sending messages via cell phones, but is not as engaged in the war as before.

"We actually see discussions among (Taliban foot soldiers), chatter among them ... wondering where their senior leaders are, and wondering why (Taliban leader) Mullah Omar hasn't set foot back in Afghanistan or even been heard from now in months and months and months," he said.

When asked about the rocky U.S. relationship with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Petraeus denied there were serious problems and defended Karzai as a leader trying to curb corruption. Petraeus said he and Karzai usually talk once a day, sometimes more, and take walks in the garden behind Karzai's house.

"We have the kind of relationship that, I believe, we can each be forthright with the other and that means occasionally, again, confronting issues that are difficult for either of us," he said.

In a separate interview with The Washington Post, Petraeus made clear he was not looking to shake up the war strategy pursued by his predecessor, Gen. Stanley McChrystal. McChrystal was forced to resign after he and his aides were quoted in a Rolling Stone article as being dismissive of their civilian bosses.

With Obama's troop buildup under way and a plan to increase civilian capacity, Petraeus said, "What you have to do is to start turning inputs into output."

"I didn't sign up for a honeymoon," he said.

TIME

As the fighting intensifies, the Pentagon and White House are hoping that political support for the war can hold at least through year's end to give Petraeus time to show progress.

Petraeus is expected to give an updated assessment to Congress in December.

Petraeus said in the interview that the war only recently has been given the right "inputs," or resources: more U.S. and Afghan troops to take over Taliban territory and more civilians to restore services to the population.

"There is understandable concern and, (in) some cases, frustration," Petraeus said. "Therefore we have got to really put our shoulders to the wheel and show during the course of this year that progress can be achieved."

Petraeus described Afghanistan as a tough and enduring fight that would require its "character and its size being scaled down over the years." If the U.S. loses, there would likely be a bloody civil war followed by a takeover by extremists. If the U.S. succeeds and Afghanistan stabilizes, the country could become the region's new "Silk Road" with the potential to extract trillions of dollars worth of minerals, he said.

But the goal is not to turn Afghanistan into an industrialized democracy, he said. Even if the nation relies heavily on tribal councils for governance, the central government in Kabul could still run the nation effectively without influence from extremist groups such as al-Qaida.

Petraeus said arresting al-Qaida

"I am impressed with the spirituality that we see in all the services provided," said a Sister from England. "It shouldn't surprise me, perhaps, but it is not something we see as much in England."
