some of the routine paperwork. We also have staff that can help with more of the applied research, or staff that helps patent inventions."

Jenski said the faculty has embraced the support system they have to apply for grants, which is one of the reasons grants have increased.

"I think the faculty deserves credit for being aggressive on writing proposals for grants," she said. Part of money USD receives for research money is tied to public service, and Jenski said the university has worked hard to make research more of a priority.

"Of the dollars we received, the amount of research money was equal to the public service money," she said. "Now it's two 2-to-1 in favor of research. Public service projects are important, but we see research as the primary mission, so it was important to increase that."

The research money isn't just going to the USD Vermillion campus. Jenski said the G.E.A.R. (Graduated Education Applied Research) in Sioux Falls has been key in receiving research money.

"The G.E.A.R. center does applied research, and the biomedical faculty has been aggressive in getting money," she said. "They work to license innovations in tissue engineering and drug delivery among other things."

Janski said the next step is to not just keep the amount of research money where it is now, but to also increase it.

"Our big task now is to figure out how to sustain growth, and we need to increase sponsorship by 15 percent to reach $50 to $60 million in four years," she said.

Janski said one of the ways USD can sustain and increase its research money is to have new programs apply for grants.

This past year, the School of Education and USD's Fine Arts department both submitted proposals.

"As these programs become more active, we can sustain this growth," Janski said.
