have been told that, depending on how the work goes, the road will be closed from 4-8 weeks."

Because the closure will directly affect normal access to the school, Manning is meeting with all parents at the schools open house at 5 p.m. tonight (Tuesday).

"This is going to require cooperation between everyone, so we are hoping all parents at the school take the opportunity to come to the open house and learn about our plans," he said. "As it is right now, parents are used to being able to drop and pick up their children in front of the school. With the construction, we are going to be utilizing the alley that runs behind the school and the existing parking lot."

Manning said that because the one-block stretch of road will be closed, the school will be using the parking lot — which will be reduced to one access point — as the primary collection point for children. He added that the school is also going to be directing children who walk to and from school to use the Sixth Street road rather than Fifth Street.

"We have several children who walk to the library after school and, because the trucks will be coming in off of Highway 50, we are directing them to Sixth as a safety precaution," he said. "We are also in the process of putting up fences to block the road off from the school."

The safety precautions may seem extreme, but according to Sacred Heart Foundation director Barb Rezac, it would only take one accident to mar the entire project for the community.

"We would rather err on the side of caution," she said. "The Catholic community has rallied to this building project so well, that I would hate to see an accident ruin the perception of the new center."

The new facility, which will be located adjacent to Sacred Heart Church, will house the church's meeting spaces and educational classrooms, as well as provide a new location for the Sacred Heart Middle School.

"The new facility will be so much more accessible to the church community. We will have more of a feeling of one community than we do with having to cross over to Link (Auditorium) for any gatherings," she said. "We will now have two kitchens and multi-use areas. In all, I think the new facility is going to help us build a stronger community of faith."

Lichter said the excitement he is seeing in both the church and school is contagious.

"Everything is right on schedule," he said. "We are grateful we got a good bid. All the old buildings came down without any issues. We are just moving in a very good and positive direction. We have been seeing a lot of drive-bys to see the progress."

The Catholic Campaign of the Yankton Catholic Community, which was officially launched last fall, has raised approximately $3.7 million of the $5.85 million total for the construction. It's a sign that Lichter and Rezac say shows how supported the project is in the area.

Rezac said even people who may not have been able to support monetarily have stepped up and offered in-kind hours.

"The entire demolition was done with in-kind hours," she said. "We actually came out a bit ahead after all of the donations of time, material and labor."

However, she stressed the fundraising campaign is continuing.

"We are still canvassing for gifts," she said. "It is an ongoing process that we are working with daily. Watching this all come together has been a ministry in itself. The walls will soon be up. It is amazing how quickly it has all gone and exciting to think that in a year we will be in the new facility."

Report: Climate Panel Should Be Better Run

WASHINGTON (AP) — An international panel of scientists says the acclaimed committee studying global warming needs stronger leadership and fundamental changes.

Representatives of the world's science academies have released their report on the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a body that won a Nobel Prize in 2007. Last year, a series of errors embarrassed the authors of the climate report. For example the report erred in how fast the Himalayan glaciers are melting.

The InterAcademy Council, a collection of the world's science academies, said the climate change group overall does a good job. But the council said it needs an executive director, more openness and regular changes in leadership. It also called for stronger enforcement of how it reviews its research.

In a statement, unidentified officials of Wright County Egg said they are working "around the clock" to address FDA's concerns and some have already been fixed.

"To date, the vast majority of the concerns identified in the FDA report already have been addressed through repairs or other corrective measures," the company said in the statement. "We anticipate the expeditious completion of nearly all remaining items by mid-September."

Hillandale Farms released a similar statement, saying some of the issues had already been identified by the company. Animal feces and access to wildlife are normally the main concern of investigators looking for causes of an outbreak, as illnesses such as salmonella originate from feces. Michael Taylor, the FDA's deputy commissioner for foods, said in a briefing for reporters Monday that the agency cannot say how these conditions compare to other egg farms around the country but he believes they are "significant deviations from what is expected."

The agency has not traditionally inspected egg farms until there has been a problem. The FDA has said it has not inspected either of the two Iowa farms, even though the owners of Wright County Egg have a long history of health, safety, environmental and immigration violations.

The FDA will now inspect all of the nation's largest farms by the end of next year, the Obama administration announced last week.

No deaths have been reported due to the outbreak, but the number of illnesses, which can be life-threatening, especially to those with weakened immune systems, is expected to increase.

The CDC has said this is the largest outbreak of this strain of salmonella since the start of the agency's surveillance of outbreaks in the late 1970s. For every case reported, there may be 30 that are unreported.

Thoroughly cooking eggs can kill the bacteria. But health officials are recommending people throw away or return the recalled eggs.
