Flood

do if you have mold in your home when you are going through the restoration process." Admitting that part of the process is to encourage the use of local resources, Schramm acknowledged that when it comes time for the clean-up, local businesses might be overrun with requests. "Because we want people to do business with people they know and trust, this is also a way for flood victims to be able to contact area businesses, who — if they are inundated — can recommend someone. That way we keep it local and work only with people we trust," she said. Even as the floodwaters still are too high to allow many back in their homes, Schramm said it is vital to get the information out there as early as possible. "We wanted to get it out soon enough that people can start doing their research now," she said. Access the resource guide is available in many locations in Yankton and on the web.

"People can go to yanktonsd.com/flood on our website," Schramm said. "It is also on the yanktonflood.com site. We have emailed it to all the Chamber members who will be dealing with flood issues, from our bankers to our contractors, so that they can have a copy. And we have printed copies in our office that can be picked up." Schramm added that if other agencies have information that they feel should be added, they should contact her, since the primary document is a digital file it can be updated. Schramm also requested that if anyone in the community is approached by a non-local business to let her office know about it. "The Better Business Bureau number is on the guide," she said. "We just want to make sure and check them out so we are aware who is operating in the community. If a deal sounds too good to be true it probably is. Just be aware, if you are being pressured ... to take the deal now, or a huge down payment is being expected up front, all are indicators of potential scams. Do the research so you don't get taken advantage of in this time of recovery."

with the Agriculture Department. Investigations are often delayed because victims can't remember what they ate or aren't cooperative, says Caroline Smith DeWaal, food safety director for the Center for Science in the Public Interest. But DeWaal says she believes the government should have told the company — and the public — about the possible outbreak much sooner. "Clearly this kind of delay in an outbreak situation is one that puts the public health at risk," DeWaal said. Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., a longtime advocate for stronger food safety laws, sent Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack and CDC Director Thomas Frieden a letter Thursday questioning why it took so long to announce the recall. "It is simply unacceptable that after more than four months of illnesses and more than 10 weeks of investigation by both the CDC and the USDA we have so few answers to the obvious questions surrounding this outbreak," DeLauro wrote. Braden and David Goldman of the USDA's Food Safety and Inspection Service said at a briefing Thursday that authorities weren't sure about the source of the outbreak until July, when they identified it through shopper's card information from victims who had purchased the Cargill turkey, and a leftover sample of turkey from a victim's home. Previous evidence from the investigation had pointed not just to Cargill, but other companies as well, they said. Less conclusive evidence had pointed toward the Cargill plant in Springdale, Ark., much earlier, however. Samples of Cargill ground turkey purchased at four retail locations as part of routine testing between March 7 and June 27 showed contamination with the same strain of salmonella, though those samples were not specifically linked to the illnesses. Routine salmonella testing in 2010 also showed the pathogen at the plant. Part of the difficulty for investigators is that USDA rules make it harder to investigate and recall salmonella-tainted poultry. Because salmonella is so common in poultry, it is not illegal for meat to be tainted with the pathogen. General guidance to consumers is to cook ground turkey to 165 degrees and to handle it properly before it is cooked. If it is cooked and handled properly, it is safe.
