GFP Monitors Loss of Fish Through Missouri River Dams

PIERRE — Large volumes of water being released from Missouri River reservoirs have resulted in lake herring and rainbow smelt being flushed through Oahe and Big Bend Dams.

While some fish pass through unharmed, many die due to drastic pressure changes or physical trauma from the hydroelectric turbines. Many of the dead fish are being found along the shores of Lake Sharpe and the upstream reaches of Lake Francis Case.

Lake herring and rainbow smelt make up the vast majority of dead fish found below the dams; however, some walleye, catfish and carp have been reported as well. "While some walleye have been found among the dead fish, 99 percent of them are lake herring," said Robert Hanten, wildlife biologist for South Dakota Game Fish and Parks.

Lake herring and rainbow smelt are cold-water fish that inhabit the deeper, colder waters of Lake Oahe. High water releases, combined with the deep locations of the outlet structures, have made those species vulnerable to being flushed through the dams.

Biologists will continue to monitor fish on Lake Sharpe and Lake Francis Case this summer and fall during scheduled surveys. As flows through the dams diminish and waters cool in the fall, the number of fish passing through the dams should also decline.
