Days

Riverboat Days, even they were surprised at how much actually goes on through out the weekend.

"We went to the lawnmower races for the first time, that was incredible fun," Brooks said. "We went to the rodeo, the patriotism, the event was just amazing. I am so in awe of everything that goes on."

Joan said on Sunday morning they went and listened to Brulé perform at the west end of Riverside Park, it was just so peaceful, with the music and the river in the background.

"The river has not been peaceful all summer," she said. "During that concert, it was just an amazing picture and it was peaceful."

Visitors both at the park and at the mall said the weekend was great fun.

Several mentioned that having Brulé back was a big draw for them to return.

"Brulé being back makes Riverboat Days feel complete," said one guest from Tabor.

Another commented that the Dweebs concert on Saturday night has become an end-of-summer event for her and her friends.

"We just make a point to come see them; they are fun, a great party," she said. "The entire atmosphere is kind of Yankton getting out to have one last fun party before school kicks into full gear."

As for the vendors, many said that while the crowds were good, sales are down.

"It has been a little difficult," said Danica Gillespie of Spell Out Loud, who was located at the Mall. "I have seen a lot of people just looking and not really buying anything."

Jay Galvin of AJ Treasure Hut agreed. "It has been good this year," he said. "But with the economy and all the water, sales have been kind of touch and go. I have been doing this 33 years and my wife 61 years, so we do a lot of shows. Traffic has been about the same, maybe down some (compared to previous years)."

Galvin added that he and his wife have been at Riverboat Days three times and he appreciates the customers who make the effort to find them each year.

"The people are from everywhere," he said. "We had a lady that took the day off just to come up and talk to us. So, we have the repeat customers which are great, and we look forward to meeting new people every year. A lot of people come by and visit, so we really enjoy it."

Another vendor said while sales are down this year, they have been down at every show they have gone to in the Midwest this summer.

"I really think the economy and the flooding this year have been affecting sales everywhere. It is just kind of what we have come to expect to happen this summer, I guess," she said. "A lot of people walking around, but not many carrying packages, so I know it is not just me. No matter what, I will be back next year. Riverboat Days has become an August tradition."

However, the Schilds said throughout the weekend talking to as many of the vendors as they could, they heard more positive results.

"We had several tell us that while Friday was a bit slow, Saturday and Sunday were going gangbusters, especially the food vendors," Brooks said. "In all, I think it was a great weekend for everyone. It is definitely one that we won't forget."

The Schilds also thanked everyone who has made the Riverboat Days a tradition and an event people look forward to.

"Without the board and their hard work, the volunteer hours they put in behind the scenes, this would not happen," Brooks said. "Just like today (Sunday) as soon as it is all done, they will be down here cleaning up the park and getting it all back to normal. They do that without getting paid and with very little thanks. They deserve our thanks."

That tradition and sense of community giving is what Green sees growing every year.

"We have been doing this for more than 20 years in Yankton," She said. "We want to continue to grow, have new events and by bringing back the ones everyone enjoys. All we can say is thank you to everyone who makes Riverboat Days great — from the vendors to the guests to the performers and the volunteers — thank you for making Riverboat Days what it is, a fun weekend to share with friends."
