cording to Homstad. “You don’t have to live in an urban setting to have urban experiences,” she said. “I think there is a growing desire to have a more urban experience in smaller communities and have the best of both worlds.”

If the project is a success, Homstad and Miner said it’s possible that the wall will return in the future with different themes.

“The idea is that, if the project is successful and people want more of this, we want to provide it and do it well,” Homstad said.

For Homstad, being involved with “Before I Die” is a success in and of itself.

“For me, this project is part of my bucket list,” she said. “Before I die, I want to contribute something meaningful. I’m curious to see what kind of impact this has.”

time) and starvation because of lack of access to modern methods of planting.

Youn, an MBA student, had been pondering this, and he had an idea. Thus as born One Acre, a non-profit program that helps sub-Saharan farmers reap higher yields from their shambas through education, seeds and fertilizer.

Thurow, who’d also seen poverty and starvation in Africa, was intrigued. He asked Youn if he might follow four farmers for a year, through wanjala and be-yond.

As a village elder, Leonida Wanyama needed to set a good example for others, which is why she joined One Acre. She was amazed the first year at the bounty she reaped, but it wasn’t enough. Her husband, Peter, was ill and their son, Gabriel was away at school. School was very expensive: $255 a year.

Rasoa Wasike was so pleased with One Acre that she inspired several others to join. But that wasn’t Rosoa’s only endeavor; she was lucky to find other employment so her wanjala wasn’t quite so severe.

Zipporah Bikiti had jeered at neighbors who used the One Acre methods, until she saw their lush, bountiful maize fields. She was determined that this wanjala — a particularly long, terrible one — would be her family’s last.

Francis Mamati and his wife had a vision. They had three acres and their son, who owned a nearby café, had a small plot, too. A shamba like that, properly farmed, could create dreams.

So why, you’re asking, should you read a book about a bunch of miniature farms half a world away? Maybe you won’t want to... but I was blown away by it.

“The Last Hunger Season” is, indeed, about four Kenyan farmers and the last time each had little more than tea to feed their families from January through June. But in telling their stories, the politics behind fixing what’s wrong, and the triumph of success, author Roger Thurow also gives his readers a huge lesson in gratitude: chances are you have food, and this book never lets you forget that.

I think you’re going to like “The Last Hunger Season,” just don’t be surprised if it makes you a little uncomfortable. Still, if you want something that’s sobering, glorious and thought-provoking, this book is super-sized.

sponse would be. But the response has been positive and up-lifting. Riverboat Days is really meant to be a time for citizens to come together and enjoy one of the last weekends of the summer. It is meant to be as free and fun as possible. Those of us on the board believe in that spirit. Watching businesses and citizens support us this year has shown us that many of our citizens believe in that spirit as well! What a great feeling to have as the last couple of weeks of preparation take place.

Mark your calendars for Aug. 17-19 at Riverside Park for Riverboat Days 2012: “Weekend at the Movies!” The 2012 Board of Directors are: John Kraft (Co-chair), Randy Oliver (Co-chair), Nancy Teachout, Bob Byrkeland, Mike Gullikson, Chad Miller, Dick Hunhoff, Chopper Johnson, Donna Madson, Cliff Madson, Bonnie Pinkelman, Rick Stone, Rich Andre and Troy Whitley.
