Trip

said. "We helped them set up their basketball hoop and we played with basketballs and volleyballs and a whole bunch of games with them."

One of the most interesting aspects for Fedders was the language barrier, she said. "I took Spanish IV, but other than that, not many people in our group knew how to speak Spanish, so it was interesting to watch everybody," she said. "There were a lot of people using objects and stuff trying to talk with them. Even the people who could speak Spanish, a lot of us needed them to slow down. It was so much more interesting to see how both of us could try and help each other."

For Moser, the most memorable experience was watching the youth interact with the residents of Puerto Rico.

"The idea of getting yourself out of your comfort zone and being willing to enter into a conversation with somebody who doesn't share the same interests or background was one of the best parts," he said. "The kids are going to go back to school, and some of them might be the great athlete or the smart kid in the class, and there might be somebody who they don't know or don't have interaction with because they don't do the same things. They can apply what they learned from the mission trip right there. That's really a lesson for the kids, and for the adults, no matter where you live."

The group also had the opportunity to attend a church service in Puerto Rico.

"The whole worship was all in Spanish, but we did have a translator there," Fedders said. "Their worships are so much different than ours. They were jamming out to Spanish songs the entire time, and they would tell us to come up and dance with them. It was such a great experience."

Moser noted the trip wouldn't have been possible without the support from the community of Yankton.

"The kids were really involved with the fundraising this year," he said. "We did a 5K run, and on our T-shirts, we listed sponsorships. Businesses from all over Yankton would give us money just to support our mission. It's really commendable and it says a lot about the community of Yankton. We have a community that can recognize that young people are doing important things and our community is willing to support that."

The once-in-a-lifetime experience is something Fedders said she will never forget, especially because she had the chance to relate with children from a different country.

"We would talk to the kids about why they were there," she said. "One kid was in a juvenile detention center for speeding. It's just crazy how different things are in their country. But, even if there's a million miles between us, everything that we're going through is the same. Everybody has teenage issues, and it was really cool that we could relate to all of them."

the only one he proposes. Ryan also wants to shift Medicaid to the states and sharply limit the growth of federal spending on that program. Medicare and Medicaid together reach some 100 million people.

His votes in Congress have gone against the grain at times. When Republicans have attempted to repeal federal wage protection laws for unions, Ryan has sided with Democrats in opposition. Even so, Ryan ardently campaigned for Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who fended off a recall attempt spurred by state law changes cast as anti-union.

Ryan, whose district lost General Motors assembly plant a couple of years ago, supported the multi-billion dollar auto industry bailout started under then-Republican President George W. Bush and continued under President Barack Obama. Romney famously penned an opinion piece in 2008 with the headline, "Let Detroit Go Bankrupt," arguing automakers could have gone through a managed bankruptcy and re-emerged without such massive help from taxpayers.

But there's no question that his budget and Medicare plan stand among the boldest ideas in Washington and present the fattest target for Democrats. Mindful of such sensitivities, Romney campaign adviser Ed Gillespie emphasized Sunday that as president, Romney "would be putting forward his own budget" as much as he admires Ryan's, making clear the presidential hopeful is not wedded to his running mate's proposals.

In taking his place on the ticket, Ryan lamented a Washington culture of timidity on the pressing issues of the time.

"We're running out of time — and we can't afford four more years of this," Ryan said as Romney looked on. "Politicians from both parties have made empty promises which will soon become broken promises — with painful consequences — if we fail to act now."

Obama's campaign said Ryan's ideas were the potentially painful ones.

Ryan has taken thousands of recorded votes since coming to Congress in 1999, a minefield for any candidate let alone one aspiring to the White House.

Ryan also signed his name to 1,064 bills and resolutions over that span. Many deal with eye-glazing tax policy. Others aim to restrict abortion procedures. He's made a recurring push for line-item veto powers to restrain spending.

Despite voting solidly against abortion rights, he's given little indication, especially in recent years, that he wants to go to the ramparts on the issue. His litmus test has been budget matters, and he's been known to endorse candidates who see abortion differently, saying he is willing to agree to disagree "with mutual respect."

In 2009, he voted to prohibit federal money from being used to pay for an abortion or for any part of a health plan that covers abortion — except when the abortion results from rape or incest or when the pregnancy threatens the woman's life.

Many years earlier, he backed bans on so-called partial birth abortion that made an exception for the life of the mother, but not for rape or incest.

A number of his legislative actions qualify as parochial measures. For instance, he's sponsored legislation to modify tax treatment of archery equipment and ease tariffs on motorcycle wheels, clearly a nod to Harley-Davidson Motor Co.'s Wisconsin base.

The local touches don't impress Ryan opponents, who say he's padded his national reputation at the expense of his district.

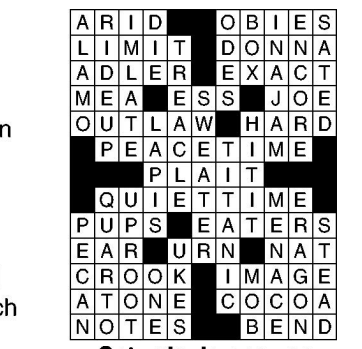

Still, Ryan has won seven congressional elections, most handily. He has never run statewide, meaning the campaign to snatch the Wisconsin electoral votes that went to President Barack Obama last time will be a test of his appeal beyond his back yard.
