from out of town? Yes. But that's not the ultimate goal. The ultimate goal is, we want people in Yankton to have more to do and have more positive things to say about Yankton."

Commissioners said the idea was a good one but all were leery of hiring a full-time events coordinator.

When asked, Larson said his department could accomplish at least some of the events without a new organizer. However, Interim City Manager Al Viereck said holding an event a month at current staff levels would be next to impossible.

"You're going to tax his staff so badly that they're going to leave him, even his part-time staff," he stated.

Viereck pointed out that Russell put a significant amount of time into organizing the 150th celebration in 2011, and he was able to tap into different city departments for assistance. Larson would not have the same ability, he stated.

The success of the 2011 concert was a benchmark throughout the discussion.

"The reason we're talking about (an events coordinator), in my opinion, is because how the 150th worked out," Commissioner Paul Lowrie said. "It was a very light load on the community. That was the positive experience out of that. We were able to do something larger and manage it because we had city backing and staff doing everything."

Commissioner Charlie Gross pointed to the Fourth of July fireworks celebration being taken over by the city in recent years because the Chamber of Commerce could not find enough volunteers to assist with it. With an events coordinator, he said the city could find itself being asked to take on more activities.

Gross also suggested the lack of volunteers indicates the public does not really care about whether an event like the Fourth of July is held.

A lack of volunteers does not indicate community disinterest, Commissioner David Knoff said.

"The Fourth of July is a perfect example," he stated. "If you don't think it's that important of a deal to the community because the Chamber doesn't want to do it, then let's quit doing it. Then (the public will) come in here, set us all on fire, shoot us and do everything else. They want the event. They just don't want to step up to it. They want to go to it."

"People volunteer their time, but it's easy to get burned out because nine people end up carrying the load," Knoff continued. "I don't think it's a function of people not wanting the events. I think ... taxpayers are willing to let their tax dollars go toward making the events happen. They would rather pay taxes and have the city do the event than do it themselves."

A MORE SENSIBLE APPROACH?

Guiding the discussion, Mayor Nancy Wenande asked if adding a retail development position instead of an events coordinator would make more sense.

Several commissioners said having someone to promote retail growth in the community is a higher priority than an events coordinator.

"It's nice to think the developers will come to us, but Menards didn't come to us," Wenande said. "We went to the developer, and we pushed it. 'We' being Doug and the city. Someone had to make that connection. Someone had to go after it. They weren't just going to come knocking on our doorstep."

"If we want to be aggressive and really become a player in southeast South Dakota, we need to have someone lead us in that direction," she continued. "Is it going to be our new city manager? Quite possibly. But if not, should we have someone driving that for us? Absolutely."

Commissioner Craig Sommer said a full-time individual could work on not only retail but pretty much anything non-industrial. The Yankton Office of Economic Development focuses on that sector.

"What you need is to have somebody that is full time and out promoting Yankton and calling these developers every two weeks," Sommer stated. "You don't get back to them every six months. Without having somebody to do this, we're at a big disadvantage to a Brookings, an Aberdeen or Omaha. Those towns have people actively going out and trying to do this for them."

The commission also debated whether it wanted to encourage Mike Dellinger in the Office of Economic Development to begin pursuing retail development in addition to industrial growth.

Viereck reminded the commission that it will soon be interviewing for a new city manager.

"You know the success that can lead to," he said. "I don't think there is one of us that questions that Doug (Russell) is the reason Menards is here. What about challenging the new city manager and saying you'll give him an administrative assistant?"

That employee could be charged with focusing on retail development, Viereck proposed.

Larson added that, when he was an employee of Orange City, Iowa, an assistant city manager focused on both retail development and events planning.

Several on the commission said the idea of hiring an administrative assistant for the city manager who could take on these duties would be ideal. No one vocalized disapproval.

The commission agreed to come back to the issue in the future once a new city manager has been hired.
