Additional Anthrax Cases Identified In Colorado

LAKEWOOD, Colo. (AP) — Two more cows have died from anthrax exposure in northeast Colorado, expanding the first outbreak of the disease in the state in 31 years to three ranches.

Last week, 60 cows died on a Logan County ranch, where anthrax was positively identified in one animal. Officials say it's likely they all died of the disease.

The Colorado Department of Agriculture said Wednesday the additional cows were on two separate adjacent ranches. Both died from the disease.

State Veterinarian Keith Roehr said all three ranches involved share fences and the new cases likely are the result of cows grazing in an area with soil containing anthrax spores.

Neighboring herds have been vaccinated. No cows left the affected ranches so none entered the food supply and no human infection has been reported, Roehr said.

Anthrax kills livestock within hours of infection and can decimate herds if animals are not quickly treated, he said.

Anthrax is caused by a bacterium that forms in spores and can lie dormant in soil for decades until ingested. Humans get anthrax most commonly through direct contact with infected animals usually when spores get into a cut or abrasion on the skin. Without treatment it can be fatal, but early treatment with antibiotics is very effective.

The personnel on the three affected ranches are working with their doctors and public health officials and are being given antibiotics as a precaution, Roehr said.

Agriculture officials are investigating the incidents and the Northeast Colorado Health Department is trying to ensure that anyone at risk for a possible exposure receives treatment.

All of the initially infected carcasses have been incinerated. Fire kills anthrax spores so burning is the best means to dispose of the carcasses, state agriculture officials said.

“At this point we really don't anticipate any health threat for the residents in northeast Colorado in regards to anthrax or from the smoke or plume from the incineration of the carcasses,” Tony Cappello, the district public health administrator for the Northeast Colorado Health Department, said in a statement.

It's unclear why anthrax suddenly has surfaced after no reported cases in Colorado in more than three decades, Roehr said. The three ranches are in the South Platte River Valley, where floods followed by drought are common and the region has alkaline soil types, characteristics favorable to anthrax spores, he said.

Race

“After I got done with the show, people began to ask me what's next,” Meyer said. “I began to embrace my inner athlete and made exercise a part of my daily life.”

She was asked by Jay Leno right after the show what she would do next. Jokingly, she said she would run in a race in all 50 states. However, she realized this would be a good motivation for her to keep the weight off and is now known as her personal initiative called “50 in 50 by 30 — 50 races in all 50 states by the time she turns 30 years old on March 15, 2014.

Meyer started the 50 in 50 initiative in 2009. But between December 2009 and September 2011, she had only run in six races — one of which, however, was the Boston Marathon.

“Starting last September, I really kicked off ‘50 in 50 by 30’ by running in 10 races between that September and November,” Meyer said.

She will continue her initiative by running in the Mount Marty College Riverboat Days 5K run on Saturday. It will be her 23rd race; and she is trying to run about two to three races a month.

She is doing the Yankton race because Meyer trains a client in the area who asked her to run the race with her.

In addition to her running in every state, Meyer is now a certified personal trainer, along with her fiancé Daniel Wright, whom she met on the show. Just this year, the couple established FitnessWright, LLC in Des Moines, where they train clients of all ages and skill levels using the experience they gained on “The Biggest Loser.”

“It's been quite a challenge financially, with starting the weight loss coaching and personal training business to juggle everything with traveling to races,” Meyer said.

However, she added that every time she remembers why she's running in the races, it motivates her to keep pressing on.

So far this year, she has already run in various events in Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, Utah, Maryland, Nevada, Oklahoma, Michigan, Oregon and Washington.

“It's not about being a size two. It's more about being able to complete the races,” Meyer said. “I enjoy inspiring other people to know they can do it too.”

Meyer noted that being on “The Biggest Loser” changed her life in ways she never imagined possible.

“I went from having no purpose in life and no promising job prospects, to traveling and owning my own business,” she said.

She added that she embraced the “be the change” attitude and has applied it to all parts of her life, including working as a personal trainer and educating others on how to create well-balanced, nutritious and delicious meals.

Meyer tells people that when the show ended, her life really had just begun.

“It has truly been a whirlwind of a journey since ‘The Biggest Loser,’” Meyer said. “I'm still training and having fun.”

She added that she has truly enjoyed being able to motivate others to keep going, even when the times are tough. One of the things she tells other people at races is to not stop walking when they get tired and to keep pressing on.

Meyer advises other people that they need to hold themselves accountable and be responsible for their own lives. She added that people need to make time for themselves and for their health and wellness needs.

This year, her 50 in 50 schedule gets even more difficult as she has added triathlons to her schedule of races. However, she was able to get Giant Bicycles and Bike World to sponsor her. They even donated a 2011 Giant Avail for her training and racing needs.

Some of her upcoming races include a half-marathon in Tennessee and a mini-marathon in North Dakota.

“Being on ‘The Biggest Loser’ truly helped me get my life back,” Meyer said. “It gave me a jump start to the rest of my life.”
