lar award for its window restoration project in 2010.

"The windows really brightened it up," Sall said. "The tiles will do the same thing — a finishing touch, if you will."

Matching funds for the grant are still being collected and can be donated by calling 605-665-7470.

"If anyone wants to contribute to the project, they're more than welcome to," Sall said. "Anything would help."

Prayer

The case has drawn attention because it could provide the court's conservative majority an opportunity to alter a legal rule that dates to the 1980s and a set of opinions by then-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Her decisions said government actions would violate the First Amendment if they appeared to "endorse" religion. That rule has been followed in cases saying that government agencies cannot display the Ten Commandments in their buildings or host Nativity scenes at Christmas.

But O'Connor's "endorsement" standard, which remains the law, can be difficult to interpret. Part of the difficulty is that what one person perceives as endorsement of religion might seem completely benign to someone else. The standard has often led to disputed rulings and widely differing decisions among lower courts.

In the current case, the Obama administration has told the court that Greece's practice should not be considered an endorsement. The town council's opening of its meetings with a Christian prayer "does not amount to an unconstitutional establishment of religion merely because most prayer-givers are Christian and many or most of their prayers contain sectarian references," wrote U.S. Solicitor Gen. Donald Verrilli Jr.

He noted that the House and Senate had official chaplains and that the court in 1983 upheld opening prayers in state legislatures. If local councils may have religious invocations, the law should not require them to "closely police the content of prayers," he said.

Eighty-five House members and 34 senators joined two friend-of-the-court briefs that also urged the court to make clear that prayers and religious invocations are constitutional. They had not expected the administration would weigh in as well.

Colleges

Two other sets of population trends promise to affect enrollments in the years ahead. In recent years, the state universities have done well with non-resident students from the region. But forecasts show a plateau ahead, while South Dakota looks to see larger classes of high school graduates.

Warner said state universities there will be a greater mix of race and economic backgrounds, with a larger proportion of American Indian students expected. Warner said the state universities will need to work harder at helping academically and financially students from those backgrounds.
