repeat project, he doesn't anticipate it happening again within the next 40 years.

"The situation came about after the flooding of the Missouri River in 2011. This was something that probably won't happen again," Shuckman said.

At this time, species such as gizzard shad, grass carp, smallmouth and largemouth buffalo were introduced to the lake. Since this time, their populations have rapidly spiked.

"We found that 85 percent of the largemouth bass population is gone because of the invasive species," Schuckman said. "The anglers on this side of the river have told me that fishing isn't what it used to be."

Though a much needed project, the lake kill-off will impact many people in the vicinity of the lake. Because of all the dead fish, there will be some smell.

"We don't have enough manpower to pick up all the dead fish," Schuckman said. "They will have to just decompose. But it has to be done in order to be successful. There is no way to correct the problem besides this plan."

Once the process is complete, the lake will be restocked with game fish such as bass, bluegill and walleye.

"We are being proactive and going to get this done. We owe that to the fisherman," said Schuckman.

Organizations involved in planning and executing the renovation of the lake are Nebraska Game and Parks Commission, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the Gavins Point National Fish Hatchery and the South Dakota Game Fish and Parks Dept.

South Dakota and Nebraska will be sharing the costs of the project.

"It's a good example of how the two state work together," said Chief of Fisheries and Aquatic Resources for the GF&P John Lott. "It's a project that needs to be done together."

Russia

actions in Ukraine are straining the Russian economy, which has "ground to a halt."

The U.S. and the EU have accused Russia, which annexed Ukraine's Crimean Peninsula in March, of fomenting tensions in eastern Ukraine by supplying arms and expertise to a pro-Moscow insurgency, and have imposed asset freezes and loan bans on a score of individuals and companies.

White House spokeswoman Laura Lucas Magnuson decried the move, saying "Retaliating against Western companies or countries will deepen Russia's international isolation, causing further damage to its own economy."

Russia depends heavily on imported foodstuffs — most of it from the West — particularly in the largest and most prosperous cities such as Moscow. Food and agricultural imports from the U.S. amounted to $1.3 billion last year, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and in 2013 the EU's agricultural exports to Russia totaled 11.8 billion euros ($15.8 billion).

Putin's order says the limits are being imposed "with the goal of guaranteeing the security of the Russian Federation" and calls for undertaking measures to guard against quick price hikes.

The order appears to show that Russia, although increasingly suffering the effects of Western sanctions, is disinclined to back down on Ukraine. Russia denies allegations that it is supporting the Ukrainian rebels or supplying them with equipment and has rejected claims that its artillery has been firing from across the border.

As tensions over Ukraine rise, a respected newspaper this week cited unnamed sources as saying Russia is considering closing its airspace to European carriers flying to Asia. The report sent the stocks of some airlines sharply lower.
