the school district's aging facilities. He said those are issues "we're going to have to have a discussion about" down the line.

The board unanimously approved the strategic plan. The school board also heard a proposed three-year technology plan from technology committee co-chairs Todd Dvoracek, the Yankton Middle School principal, and Jerome Klimisch, principal at Stewart Elementary School. Much of it complemented elements of the strategic plan.

"We focused on providing our students access so that we have the opportunities to use this technology now and as we move into the future," Dvoracek said.

He said the committee's mission was to create "a plan to integrate technology" throughout all class levels.

The goals put forth included funding, which business manager Jason Bietz said fit within the confines of the budget.

"We're working small and seeing where we go," Dvoracek said.

The board also unanimously approved the technology plan.

In other action Monday, the school board:

- heard concerns from Kindle about discussion at the statewide level in regards to changing how capital outlay funds are distributed to school districts.

One possibility — among many — is that all money goes into one account and is distributed on a per-pupil basis.

"It is a big concern for a lot of school districts," said board chairperson Kathy Greenway. "It would be a big detriment to our community if they look at reallocating it like they'd like to be able to do."

Added business manager Jason Bietz: "There are a lot of ideas out there. Few of them are good."

Kindle said he believes the funding should remain under local control. "We want to make those decisions right here in this room," he said.

- approved new performance evaluations for classified employees — such as custodial personnel, bus drivers and secretarial/clerical staff — and for classified professionals, counselors and paraprofessionals, including speech pathologists and therapists.

- approved a request from the Gayville-Volin School District to establish student pick-up points within the Yankton school district;

- recognized Darrell Mogck, who has been named the South Dakota School Transportation Association's 2014 School Bus Driver of the Year. Mogck, who was in attendance, received a standing ovation from the audience and board members.

Ebola: Questions, Answers About An Unproven Drug

BY LAURAN NEERGAARD
AP Medical Writer

WASHINGTON — An experimental Ebola drug has been used to treat two American aid workers and a Spanish missionary priest. Could Liberian doctors be next?

The Liberian government said Monday that it will receive doses of the drug to treat two doctors in the country. They would be the first Africans to receive it.

The manufacturer, Mapp Biopharmaceutical Inc., said in a statement posted Monday afternoon on its website that the supply of the drug is now exhausted.

The announcement came as the World Health Organization considered ethical questions about who should get access to an experimental drug in an emergency.

Some questions and answers about the Ebola drug:

Q: What is this drug?

A: Called ZMapp, it is a cocktail of specially engineered antibodies designed to target and inactivate the Ebola virus.

Q: What do we know about whether it works?

A: Very little. Various antibodies have been tested in small numbers of monkeys, but not people. In one study, 43 percent of treated monkeys survived when the drug was given after the animals showed symptoms.

Mapp Biopharmaceutical now is developing a combination of three antibodies that seemed most promising in those animal studies.

Q: Why isn't ZMapp being tested more widely to find out if it works in people?

A: There's not enough available. The antibodies are grown inside tobacco plants, and then extracted and purified, a slow process. U.S. officials have estimated that only a modest amount could be produced in two or three months, unless some way to speed production is found.

Q: What does it mean that the two American aid workers who received the drug are reported to be slowly improving?

A: Top U.S. health officials stress that there's no way to know if the drug really helped, or if those two patients would have been among the 40 percent of people who are surviving this outbreak anyway. Without human studies, there also isn't any way to know if the drug might harm instead of help.

There is no proven treatment for Ebola. But basic supportive care — things like keeping patients hydrated, maintaining their blood pressure and treating any complicating infections — can make a difference in survival, says Dr. Tom Frieden, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The two U.S. patients, both infected in Liberia, are being treated at Emory University Hospital in Atlanta.

Q: How were the Americans and Spanish priest chosen to get some of those limited doses, rather than Africans?

A: The international relief organization Samaritan's Purse and Emory University Hospital requested that the manufacturer provide some of the drug for the two Americans, and the manufacturer agreed. As for the Spanish missionary priest, it wasn't clear exactly how Spanish officials obtained a dose that apparently was in Geneva. The priest also was infected in Liberia and is in isolation at a Madrid hospital.

Typically, the Food and Drug Administration doesn't regulate shipments of unapproved drugs for emergency use in individual patients outside the U.S.

The World Health Organization is debating if any further limited supplies of experimental drugs should be used during the outbreak, and under what conditions. But the agency cannot force a manufacturer to go along. Indeed, using an experimental drug outside of a research study isn't just a gamble for patient safety. What if a drug might benefit patients early in the disease, but doctors can't tell because it was given only to the most gravely ill?

Q: How is Liberia getting the drug?

A: The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services said it had helped connect Liberia with the manufacturer. "Since the drug was shipped for use outside the US, appropriate export procedures had to be followed," the statement said.

Q: Are any other drugs in the pipeline?

A: Canada's Tekmira Pharmaceuticals Corp. is developing a drug that targets Ebola's genetic material. The FDA had halted a small safety study with questions about a reaction in healthy volunteers. Last week, Tekmira announced that FDA had modified its restriction, clearing a roadblock to possible experimental use in infected patients; the company said at the time that it was "carefully evaluating options."

A handful of other companies are in earlier stages of drug development; a possible vaccine to prevent the disease is expected to begin first-stage safety studies sometime in the fall.

Q: If experimental drugs won't stop the outbreak, what will?

A: Frieden and other experts say old-fashioned public health measures: rapidly finding and isolating the sick, quarantining those exposed and educating the public on how to avoid the risk of infection. Ebola is spread through direct contact with bodily fluids of sick patients. Frieden said the two main drivers of the outbreak are improper infection control during patient care and traditional but risky burial practices that have mourners handling bodies that are still infectious.

longer get replacement parts for — we had to take one of the slides down and board up the hole because we couldn't get the parts anymore," Larson said. "We will also try and make it a boundless, or universal, playground, which means we'll try doing poured-in-place rubber foam material underneath it so people with mobility issues can get to every piece of playground equipment. Also, the play structure itself allows for wheelchairs and mobility devices to go up on to it to get to most of the play features. It would be unique to anything we have in the city of Yankton."

stock available in."

This comes despite the fact that Yankton actually built more houses than necessary for a time.

"There's pretty good evidence that we were probably over-building a bit prior to 2008," Mingo said. "We've been averaging about 20-27 per year since 2008.

According to the survey, median home-values are around $120,000. There are also 90 vacant lots and 112 acres suitable for development available for home-building. Another 156 acres are available outside the city limits if zoned correctly. Additionally, vacancy rates in rental properties were around 2 percent.

Mingo cited turnover as one of the issues that currently plagues potential home buyers.

"Existing homes were determined to be an affordable option," he said. "The problem in Yankton is that there just isn't a lot of turnover in those older neighborhoods."

Mingo said the city will probably need to invest in the high end of the housing survey's recommendations for new properties.

"In the next five years, there's the documented need for 155 to 195 additional rental units," he said. "I would say that since this analysis was done in December, you can take that number and pretty much target that 195 and maybe ramp it up to the 220 area."

Between 50 and 60 were projected to be in the moderate/market-rate price range, 40-50 higher priced and 50-60 target at the income-restricted segment.

The grant application was passed unanimously.
