Survivor

In the process, Hoffman has learned a great deal about herself and the woman she could truly become.

The "Survivor" experience contained many twists and turns, challenging Hoffman's mental and physical endurance. The life-changing experience continues to impact not only herself but her family and others around her. Hoffman's appearance forms part of a busy and educational in-service for Vermillion School District teachers both in and out of the classroom.

During one session, teachers will learn about the district's new Apple computers. The computers represent the district's continuing efforts to upgrade technology.

Another time, the faculty will split up for separate sessions, Froke said.

The elementary teachers will talk about curriculum issues. Meanwhile, the middle school and high school teachers will tour the Masaba plant and the Eagle Creek Software Services facility. "Then, we'll be back together for an organization meeting," the superintendent said.

The secondary teachers' visit to the two Vermillion businesses will serve a dual purpose, Froke said. The two firms will meet the school staff, and the educators can learn more about local workforce needs, he said.

"There, the leadership (of both businesses) will talk about the things they look for in personnel," he said. "It's a good connection, and it will help us prepare students for careers and what employers are looking for."

School

We had someone who turned down the position," he said. "There is the potential for another teacher, but that person won't be able to start at the beginning of the year, so we're going to need a substitute teacher at first."

Froke has put out the word among colleges about the art vacancy. However, specialized fields such as art may be difficult to fill, he said.

In the meantime, he has turned to using a long-term substitute art teacher.

"We hope this option works out and that it's something good for the students," he said.

In addition, the debate coaching positions remain open, Froke said. However, the Vermillion district has faced such vacancies in the past and has found qualified coaches who have produced an outstanding debate program, he said.

"We always seem to be searching for debate coaches," he said. "We usually go to the (University of South Dakota) law school, and the professors forward us names of people who are interested. It's turned out really well."

In that respect, Vermillion High School debaters excelled at the national high school tournament in Kansas City, Mo., according to VHS principal Curt Cameron. Seth Miller and Philip Erickson competed in policy debate. They broke out of the preliminary rounds and advanced to the ninth round in the finals, placing among the top 60 teams in the nation.

Robert Erickson competed in Lincoln-Douglas debate. He finished 6-6 in the preliminary rounds and didn't make the break into the finals. However, he finished among the top 100 debaters in the nation.

At its recent meeting, the Vermillion school board approved the hiring of a number of staff members.

The board hired Mary Ashes as Jolley School special education teacher, Jessica Beavers as Austin School guidance counselor and Anthony McRae as a Title I teacher.

Beavers is entering her first counseling position, while McRae — a Wayne State College graduate — is starting his teaching career, Froke said.

For Vermillion school administrators, the recent hirings have nearly completed what has become a challenging process. The district, like others across South Dakota, is seeing the impact of statewide teacher shortages.

Even when staff members are hired, the Vermillion district may receive few applicants for particular openings, Cameron told the Press & Dakotan.

That's especially true for certain teaching fields that are hard to fill, he said. "I had one applicant for a high school physics teacher and one applicant for a general high school math teacher," he said. "If I wasn't able to hire those applicants, I had no one else."

As a border community, Vermillion faces stiff competition from neighboring states where teacher pay is much higher, Cameron said.

"It's tough when (teachers) can cross the state border and make $8,000 more a year," he said.

At its last meeting, the school board approved classified personnel agreements for Katie Manson as a part-time educational assistant and Michelle (Miki) Gerten as a full-time special education assistant.

Manson attends USD, while Gerten holds a bachelor's degree in organizational communication and sociology from the University of Nebraska-Kearney. Gerten was a substitute this past year for the Vermillion school district.

The board also approved activity personnel agreements for Justin Brunick as assistant drama and new high school art teacher; Shannon Fitzsimmons as head gymnastics coach; Betsy Hughes as tennis coach; Elizabeth Landy as flag coach; Elyssa Reinke as assistant volleyball coach (9th grade); and Michael Rucker as assistant soccer coach.

Ebola

for the virus are taken by health officials for people traveling to and from this area whether they have the virus or not, adding that should a patient develop symptoms, they could be handled at about any state hospital.

"If a person comes from one of those countries, they need to be on a three-week fever watch and symptom watch," he said. "If their fever goes up during that period or they have some other Ebola-like symptoms — which could include headache, sore throat, weakness, diarrhea, skin rash, red eyes, bleeding or joint pain — they are to notify the health department and seek medical attention immediately. Then, if we do have a case or suspect — say, somebody from Guinea, Sierra Leone, Liberia or Nigeria comes here and they do get sick during that 21-day period — any hospital or clinic in South Dakota should be able to receive them."

Kightlinger added a case in South Dakota could be treated in a manner almost identical to diseases that are more common in America.

"We can contain it and control it using our normal infection control techniques that every hospital and every clinic in the state uses every day," he said. "It's the same as if somebody comes in with a case of tuberculosis or salmonella or MRSA (Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus) or any number of diseases that you need to be isolated. You put the person in a private room with a private bath and then use your normal infection control."

However, staff would have to take great care around the disease.

"(It would be) strict infection control," he said. "You can't let your guard down. Gloves, gowns, eye protection, face mask — pay strict attention to your hand hygiene, use disposable equipment and pay very good attention to your technique."

The only thing the state would not be able to do is lab work associated with the disease. Any samples would need to be sent to the CDC's lab for testing. At Yankton's Avera Sacred Heart Hospital (ASHH), infection prevention nurse Jan Johnson said ASHH is taking steps to train its staff on the virus, should the need arise.

"We're developing a tool for screening patients who have had travel to parts of the world where this virus has been found," Johnson said. "The medical staff is used to working with infectious diseases and keeping them from spreading to other people. And the supplies that we would need are readily available, whereas, in some of those countries, that's one of the major problems. We're putting out information to staff regarding what to look for."

Johnson said there are a number of precautions ASHH would employ for healthcare workers if a suspect patient were admitted.

"(We'd consider) the incubation period of the disease, what the symptoms are, who are people who might be carrying the disease and how to protect themselves from the disease," she said. "If a person actually came into the hospital and we suspected (he or she had an infectious disease), we'd put them in a private room, we'd shut the door and we'd put signs on the door explaining to people what they'd need to put on before they came into the room to protect themselves."

While Ebola could come to the U.S., Kightlinger noted conditions that have exacerbated the disease in West Africa are almost non-existent here.

"It's very low risk that it would spread here," he said. "You have to remember that the countries that this is taking place in have very poor medical infrastructure and public health infrastructures. Some hospitals don't even have running water or proper sanitation so it's very difficult for them to take care of a person. The care of the dead is very different — it's done by families and it's done in a very intimate way, whereas here ... the families don't wash the body and have the body in their home for extended periods of time."

He said ultimately, while it is a disease to take seriously, the general public is at extremely low risk due to the nature of Ebola's transmission from person to person.

"It's a gruesome disease and it certainly deserves our respect," he said. "It doesn't just wait across the town like a cloud. It's not spread by air and it's not spread by water or food."
