Study: House Calls For Frail Elders Bring Savings

BY LAURAN NEERGAARD

AP Medical Writer

WASHINGTON — Ten or 12 times a year, Beatrice Adams' daughter would race her frail mother to the emergency room for high blood pressure or pain from a list of chronic illnesses.

Then Adams found a doctor who makes house calls, and the 89-year-old hasn't needed ER care in the nearly two years since.

'I'm not a wimpy female," Adams said as Dr. Eric De Jonge wheeled his medical bag into her dining room and sat down to examine her. "I have only 11 years to make 100, and I'm going to make it."

The old-fashioned house call is starting to make a comeback as part of an effort to improve care for some of Medicare's most frail and expensive patients.

While it may sound like a luxury, bringing team-based primary care into the homes of patients like Adams, according to a new study, actually could save Medicare money by keeping them from needing pricier specialty or hospital care.

They have a lifeline," explained De Jonge, a co-founder of the medical house call program at MedStar Washington Hospital Center, who led the study.

Such elder care is rare, but is growing. Medicare paid for 2.8 million house calls in 2012, the latest data available, compared with 1.5 million about a decade ago. There are different kinds of house call programs. De Jonge's aims to provide comprehensive care. Teams of doctors and nurse-practitioners make regular visits to frail or homebound patients whose needs are too complex for a 20-minute office visit even if simply getting there wasn't a huge hurdle.

They can use portable X-rays and do EKGs or echocardiograms right in the living room. They line up social workers for supportive care, spot preventable problems such as tripping hazards, arrange home delivery of medications, and offer round-the-clock phone consultations and same-day urgent visits.

Adams has multiple chronic conditions ranging from hard-to-control blood pressure to congestive heart failure and post-traumatic stress disorder stemming from an assault.

On a recent house call, De Jonge listened for about 10 minutes as Adams got some fears off her chest. "I just shake even thinking about it," she said of the attack that still triggers nightmares. A social worker was helping, she said.

Then came the physical exam. De Jonge already had cut in half the 17 medications other doctors had prescribed. He said Adams' grogginess immediately disappeared.

One of my favorite things as a geriatrician is eliminating unnecessary medications. You see people blossom," he said.

This visit, De Jonge opened every remaining pill bottle to make sure Adams was taking them properly. Her blood pressure and oxygen levels were fine. Severe swelling in her legs wasn't a sign of any heart trouble, he reassured Adams, just vein damage. She should put her feet up for a while each day.

Does all that effort pay off?

De Jonge and colleagues compared the cost and survival of 722 patients enrolled in their house call practice in recent years with Medicare claims records of 2,161 similarly ill patients who never received home medical care.

Death rates between these two groups were similar. But over a two-year period, total Medicare costs were 17 percent lower for the house-call patients, or an average savings of about $4,200 per person per year, the group reported last month in the Journal of the American Geriatrics Society. They used more primary care but used less hospital, specialty and nursing home care.

That could add up fast, De Jonge said. Five percent of Medicare patients account for about half of the government insurance program's spending, the kind of frail older people he typi-

The 2011 flood on the Missouri River back-filled into Lake Yankton, bringing with it such invasive species as grass carp, gizzard shad, smallmouth and largemouth buffalo, bighead carp and silver carp, according to the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission.

That's probably what brought them in here, and it's obviously gotten worse," Evan said.

The upcoming renovation will follow much the same format as the 1980 renovation on Lake Yankton. Officials will spread chemicals in the water to kill all fish, which will include game fish such as bass, bluegill, catfish and walleye.

As a result, the water level will drop. According to the Nebraska Game and Parks Commission, the water level is already down four feet and is dropping. Both state commissions also made sure in press releases last week that anglers understand that any invasive species harvested must be killed before they can be transported. Richard Sullivan and his wife, Kathy, were well aware of the restrictions, but both said they welcomed the rescinded limits.

The couple from Norfolk.

Nebraska, had been camping in Yankton before the weekend, but were both on the shorelines Saturday with a fishing pole.

According to Richard, three weeks earlier while camping in Yankton, the Sullivans were told by a South Dakota resident about the upcoming renovation project at Lake Yankton.

"It doesn't seem like there's a choice," Sullivan said. "When you have some rough fish, you have to do something.

'There are opportunities for people to try things for free, to see whether or not they like certain activities," she said. "We're confident they'll served on the previous two.

But now she's associated with a new venture - as coowner of Fitness 365. The challenge, while competitive, serves a larger purpose than weight loss for a particular time period, she "A lot of people may need a little bit of an extra push to get going," Mueller said. "The more information they can get on these different places, maybe the more committed they'll be." The Chamber, along with

Smith and Fitness 365, will host a walk across Meridian Bridge on Sept. 4 at 6 p.m. Depending on the number of people present, there may also be some other activities, Mueller said, such as pushups.

She is also in charge of collecting prizes, which range from memberships to local fitness centers to gift cards at businesses across Yankton.

The end goal is to introduce fitness - and its results — into a person's every day life, Mueller added.

"Hopefully it will keep them going throughout the year, past the end date," she said. "It's all about making it part of a lifestyle.

A community-wide victory celebration will be held Dec. 5 to congratulate all participants and recognize the top three individuals and employers with the most weight loss.

produced in the United States, and European Union countries are prohibited from selling the drug for use in capital punishment.

Nebraska hasn't executed anyone since 1997, when triple killer Robert E. Williams was electrocuted in Of the 33 Nebraska inmates sentenced to death since 1973, three have been executed and 11 are on death row. One former inmate, Jeremy Sheets, was released in 2001 after his conviction was thrown out and prosecutors declined to retry him. The others have had their sentences overturned by court rulings, or died of suicide or natural Carrie Dean Moore came within six days of being executed in 2007 for murdering two Omaha cab drivers in 1979, but the state's high court issued a stay so it could decide whether the electric chair was constitutional. The following year, the court ruled the chair amounted to cruel and unusual punishment.

Gov. Dave Heineman approved a lethal-injection protocol in 2009 calling for three drugs: the anesthetic, a muscle paralyzer and a substance to stop the heart. Bruning and a former state attorney who handled death-penalty cases said the Department of Correctional Services can change the protocol after a series of public hearings and comment peri-

But the department has been scrambling recently to respond to a litany of problems: the sentencing fiasco in which hundreds of inmates were released early; the release of Nikko Jenkins, who then killed four people in Omaha; and a state prison van program in which an inmate driver, Jeremy Dobbe, killed a woman in Lincoln. A legislative committee has subpoenaed thousands of documents from the department for its investigation into the Jenkins case and prison overcrowding. And last week, in response to the miscalculated sentences, two department attorneys retired under threat of being fired.

"Certainly, the mistakes made by the department of corrections have taken a significant amount of bandwidth from the attorney general's office and the governor's office," Bruning said. 'We've spent a lot of our time cleaning up the mess made over at corrections." The Department of Correctional Services didn't respond to specific questions about the execution protocol. In an emailed statement, spokeswoman Crystal

ment still doesn't have the necessary chemicals for lethal injection. 'The department is working to identify the specific steps we will take to be prepared to carry out a courtordered execution,

Prochnow said. Besides changing the protocol to replace sodium thiopental with another drug, as other states have done, officials could find a compounding pharmacist who makes custom drugs for individual patients — to provide sodium thiopental. Still, any proposed change to state rules could be challenged in court, and Nebraska lawmakers could insert themselves into the process, said Jerry Soucie, a Lincoln defense attorney who has represented several death-row inmates. The lack of sodium thiopental remains Nebraska's biggest obstacle in carrying out executions, said J. Kirk Brown, a recently retired assistant attorney general who handled death penalty cases. Because the state doesn't manufacture its own drugs, death penalty opponents have effectively blocked executions by pressuring companies to cut off the supply. 'It's the Achilles' heel of the move to lethal injection," said Brown. Many states have continued executions by switching drugs or finding local suppliers, and the delays in states like Nebraska anger death penalty advocates. "It's a huge frustration," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director for the pro-death penalty Criminal Justice Legal Foundation. "This is ridiculous. In cases where there are no doubts that you have the right guy — which is almost all cases — there is no reason to drag it on for more than five to six years. (Opponents) have made it cumbersome on purpose, and it doesn't need to be that cumbersome." Sen. Ernie Chambers of Omaha has fought for decades to abolish the death penalty. Lawmakers passed his repeal measure once, in 1979, but then-Gov. Charles Thone vetoed it.

The issue could surface again with at least 17 new lawmakers next session, but death penalty supporters said they'll work to block any repeal effort.
