regulations or restrictions are put in place, Yankton County 4-H clubs will follow with the regulations that the South Dakota Animal Industry Board and the State of South Dakota have put in place.

"All of our youth have known they couldn't show their birds since May and have focused their summer efforts on other projects," said assistant Yankton 4-H advisor Stephanie Siebrandt.

Traditionally, the State Fair is an option as long as your livestock was exhibited at the local Achievement Days or County Fair. This year, due to the ban, contestants for poultry events do not have to show prior to competing at the state fair. As a result, there may be more 4-Hers that are willing to do the revised events come September.

"It is going to be hard," said Achievement Days and SD State Fair poultry judge Reynold Loecker. "We will see who shows up."

If this type of alternative becomes functional, the 4-Hers will still attend the fair and enter the ring. But instead of bringing a live bird, they will have their video.

In an attempt to still keep poultry involved in this year's events, coordinators have decided to do a "bird-less" showmanship contest. Each contestant brought a picture of the bird they have been working with and poultry judge Reynold Loecker asked them questions.

Contestants described parts of the bird and named particular parts by using their pictures as examples. Some contestants have made life-size cutouts of their birds while others have built a project, documenting each pose they would do in regular, live showmanship.

"It will be interesting to see how many kids actually continue with it," said live animal committee representative Ryan List. "It will be a challenge for the kids to display how they are going to show their animal via a picture."

thing. Having social support for this kind of thing is important."

Rusch agreed. "Obviously USD and the campus is really important to me since I've been here 50 years since I came here as a student," he said. "It's been a major part of my life. I'm really happy to see these talented kids here and I think that special gifted education is really important and I'm really glad they make this effort to give this opportunity to those kids."

According to the summit director Elliott Johnson, the summit was added to camp this year to help further their efforts to expand programming for gifted students throughout the state.

"The advocacy aspect was really important to us because we didn't really have that at camp before so the summit was there to really have that sendoff," he said. "We need to get more gifted programs because they're dying right now and we need more opportunity for these kids. It's so important to know that oftentimes our education system pushes for students who are behind but the higher learning students need that same opportunity. We don't challenge them enough. A lot of times you'll hear from the students, 'Well I get straight-A's and that's all the teachers expect of me.' They need more."

In Gov. Daugaard's address he applauded the students and gave them some tips to help further their education outside of camp and throughout their educational careers.

"Especially if you're a senior in high school, take Dual Credit Courses," he began. "It's a course you take while you're in high school but it's taught at the college or tech school level. So not only does it give credit toward your high school diploma but it also gives credit toward a degree after high school. They can give you a head start on a university or tech school degree and save you hundreds and in some case thousands of dollars."

Secondly, Daugaard encouraged the kids to visit the South Dakota MyLife web page.

"That's a tool to help you choose the right pathway that will lead to job opportunities after you graduate," he said. Back in my day having a college degree was enough. That's not true anymore."

Despite the confusion and frustration of the ban, 4-H leaders are optimistic that the kids who regularly participate in poultry events will return to the competition floor.

"I think those kids that do the poultry will come back next year," List said. "The kids that do it really enjoy it."

The ban can't stop individuals from owning birds or continuing to work with them. In fact, now more than ever, owners are even more concerned with keeping their flock healthy.

"The problem has not been with the individual, but with the large confinement houses," Loecker said.

This ban includes all events where birds are co-mingled including county fairs, local festivals and state fairs for the year 2015. That includes this year's state fair in Huron, Nebraska this coming September. The lack of poultry events at the Nebraska State Fair will take a toll on participants.

Some states have even considered a virtual poultry show. The requirements would vary by age groups. Each 4-H member will be required to submit a video showing off their bird's attributes. Details on submissions are still in the works.

"We (the State 4-H Director and myself) have been involved with a committee, made up of the South Dakota State Fair Manager, AIB, State Fair Open Class Superintendent and the SDSU Extension Veterinarian to discuss other plans for poultry outreach and education during the 2015 State Fair," said state 4-H Extension Associate John Keimig.

Currently, the state has released no specifics on the details of the "bird-less" poultry events at the State Fair. Because of the open-ended requirements, kids these days are getting pretty creative with their submissions.

"I was in Jackson, Minnesota last week," Loecker said. "Those kids had speeches, posters and even blankets with life-size pictures of all their ducks."

For Yankton 4-H members, the ban means that poultry competitors will have to coincide with the revised events,

Thirdly, he stressed the importance of earning as much financial assistance as possible.

"Get after those scholarship applications because if anyone can apply, you can," he said. "You, because of your intellectual prowess have the ability to rise to the top of the applications. Get out there early and look at scholarships."

Both Daugaard and the participants of the camps took time during the summit to honor First Lady Linda Daugaard.

"Marrying Linda was the best decision I've ever made," Daugaard said. "Over the past four and a half years she's been working on issues like infant mortality. There are too many infants who die and we want to stop that. She's been encouraging kids in elementary school to read and also (addressing the issues facing) foster parenting. She's done a lot for the state and we're very lucky to have her as First Lady."

First Lady Daugaard was honored with the State Initiative Award, given for her work in furthering education in South Dakota, especially in the Science, Technology, Engineering and Math (STEM) areas.

"You spent a week here learning and thinking how great Science, Technology, Engineering and Math is," she told the gathered students. "But your job's not over. Your next job is to go home and when you go back to school, talk to the teachers that sent you here and say, 'I've got a job for you. We need to spread the word about gifted education and how we need to continue it in our school system.' We need to get more students to come here because you're the ones that are leaders."

Other awards given at the summit included the Alumni Achievement Award given to Kevin Went for his past participation in the camp and then returning and giving back to the camps.

The School Spirit Award was given to Cheyenne-Eagle Butte High School for their efforts in supporting their students by fully funding 26 students to attend camp, among other things.

Despite the social stigma that gifted education camps are for only a select elite few, director Johnson said that is not the idea they are trying to promote.

"I actually started as a middle schooler who wasn't in a gifted program," he said. "I heard about it from a friend. I had to actively pursue how to be a part of it because I wasn't noticed by my teachers. A lot of find another livestock event to participate in or not compete all-together.

"It will probably affect the number of kids that do it," List said. "Hopefully next year, this will all be taken care of and we will be able to have our poultry show back."

This year's Achievement Days had six participants in the "bird-less" showmanship. This is slightly lower than the average; but come State Fair time, there is no telling how many 4-H members will be willing to participate using just a photo.

"If we can have a show next year, we will work with breeders in the spring to help our youth find show birds and re-energize enthusiasm in the project area," Siebrandt said.

Aside from poultry events, Friday's activities included all the livestock shows. It was a day full of squawking and squealing. From the swine, rabbit, poultry, dog agility and beef show, 4-H fans and members got their full fix of sights and smells.

"I have been coming up here for 40 years...poultry, rabbits, sheep, horses; we did all of that with my kids," Loecker said.

The showmanship day winded down with 4-H supper and ice cream social, to cool down from the heat of the day. Finally, the Barn-Yard Olympics tested the abilities of team work while completing farm care related tasks, like moving hay bales and carrying buckets of feed.

Today's events will be community oriented. There will be different recreational and educational events for everyone, whether you are a part of 4-H or not. Following the final livestock showing of sheep and goats, the youth carnival is sure to attract a crowd of spectators anxious to learn about what competing in 4-H events is really like, or maybe just to pet a few bunnies.

these students don't have programs themselves. They themselves feel they're gifted. That's the beauty of it all. If you want to challenge yourself as a student which is what all these kids want to do, you can be a part of this program."

Johnson said the gifted camps are not limited to a select few, they actually want more kids to attend to hopefully spark the love of learning in as many young hearts as possible.

"I think making sure everyone wants to continue in the education system is vital," he said. "We're losing kids in South Dakota because they don't feel like they're being challenged right now. These kids go and rave to their friends and we see more come every year because more kids want to learn how to be gifted. The moral of the story is everyone can be which is what these kids find out here."

Nancy, 13, an incoming eighth grader from Watertown, commented on her invaluable experience at the camp and her passion for gifted education.

"The camp has taught me a lot of things," she said. "It has taught me music skills, communication skills and it's taught me to be myself and to celebrate individuals. Everyone here feels a sense of connection because people in different towns either have a lack of gifted education or they have no gifted education at all. So it's pretty neat here because you get to express yourself and really understand what it's like to expand your knowledge. I really want to take those rules and atmosphere and apply it at school."

Nancy feels she is a unique example because she feels she is gifted in other areas than STEM.

"I have an artistic mind, unlike a lot of people at school," she said. "I'm good at reading, writing and theater but I'm not good at math. I'm kind of looked at as someone who isn't exactly smart just because I'm not in math. Being artistic isn't bad. Everyone accepts scientific minds as brilliant and STEM is great, but I really want to talk about the arts because that's even better."

Nancy looks forward to advocating for the cause of gifted education.

"There's this quote that says be the change you want to see in the world," she said. "So this is us, the gifted kids changing education in South Dakota. It might not be the whole world but it's ours."
