Laws

takes more effort than people realize.

"It's an important legal document, and we want to make sure things are the way they need to be," Nolte said.

UNDERAGE DRINKERS

Underage drinkers who seek medical help for themselves or a friend because of alcohol poisoning will receive legal immunity from alcohol charges in some situations. The law is designed to encourage underage drinkers to seek medical attention when someone's life is at risk without having to fear a criminal conviction. The law is LB439.

"We need to accept the reality that drinking occurs in a college environment, and we need to educate on how to be safe, responsible and look out for one another," said Thien Chau, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln's student body president.

NURSE PRACTITIONERS

Nurse practitioners now have more independence under a law removing a requirement that they get a written agreement to consult with a doctor before they can practice. The so-called integrated practice agreements are designed to ensure a physician is available for collaboration or referral, but nurse practitioners say they're extensively trained and could help ease the state's health care shortage. The Nebraska Medical Association opposed the law, citing patient safety concerns. The law is LB107.

NATIVE AMERICAN CHILDREN

Native American children who are at risk of being removed from their homes will have new protections that make it harder to separate them from their families and break cultural ties. The new law makes clear exactly when a social worker can remove a child, and requires that custodial preference be given to a foster home or adoptive parents who can preserve a child's relationship with his or her tribe. The law is LB566.

PRISON CROWDING AND SENTENCING

Nebraska's prison population could start to decline under a new law that increases the use of probation for non-violent offenders, increases parole opportunities and requires supervised release for felony offenders before they complete their sentences. Another law going into effect Sunday will increase the Legislature's oversight of the state prison system by creating a new inspector general position. The laws are LB605 and LB598.

DIRECT DEMOCRACY

Organizers of Nebraska petition drives can once again pay circulators by the signature rather than by the hour, making it easier to place issues on the ballot. The law overturns a 2008 ban on signature-based pay. Critics of the ban say many grassroots groups don't have the resources to pay circulators hourly. The law is LB367.

TRIAL EVIDENCE

Wrongly convicted Nebraska prisoners will have more chances to demonstrate their innocence. The law will give prisoners up to five years, instead of the current three, to seek a new trial based on newly discovered, non-DNA evidence. It also would allow judges to order DNA testing on evidence that wasn't previously examined, or where new technology could lead to more accurate or probative results. The law is LB245.

BRAND INSPECTION FEES

The cost of brand inspections for cattle could rise to as much as $1.10 per head. The Nebraska Brand Committee now has the authority to charge a higher maximum fee to cover its expenses.

The Brand Committee hasn't decided whether to increase the fees, but the new law will give its members more flexibility, said Executive Director Shawn Harvey. Harvey said the committee is working with outdated computers and needs to offer higher salaries to attract more inspectors.

"In the last three or four years, it's been difficult to get qualified applicants to apply for our openings," Harvey said.

The fee ceiling was last increased in 2005, from 65 cents to 75 cents per head. Inspections are mandatory in the western two-thirds of Nebraska anytime a bovine animal changes ownership. The law is LB85.

Clark

perseverance in others.

"There are a million reasons why I shouldn't be able to finish this trip, but it just keeps going because I'm here," Clark said. "If you see an obstacle, it's there. If you don't deal with it, it will always be there in your mind. If you stop letting things be obstacles and just go, it will all unfold."

Clark was portaged across Gavins Point Dam Saturday with the help of Lewis & Clark Recreation Area District Park Supervisor Shane Bertsch. "The people have been wonderful here — South Dakota in particular," Clark said. "The parks guys have been amazing by lining up to help us with this."

Bertsch heard about Clark's journey from Jim Gunderson of Mission Hill, who was over at the Tabor Lakeside Use Area when he ran into Clark and Jeff Troupe of Oakland, Nebraska, who has been a friend of Clark since 2004 and decided to paddle a few days with him.

"Jim gave them my number in case they needed help getting across the dam," Bertsch said. "They called me on Friday and we got the logistics down to help them out."

The group had dinner at the Lewis & Clark Resort, where Jeff Wahl, owner and operator of the resort, offered Clark and Troupe a free night's stay. The next day, Bertsch acquired a trailer to transport the canoe, and the group drove over to the Chief White Crane area to get it back in the river.

"Over the years, we have helped shuffle about 40 or 50 people going across the dam, most being during the bicentennial," Bertsch said. "We always try to help people out to get to the rest of their journey."

Knotty — Clark's hand-made, hollowed-out canoe which he built while he was blind in the aftermath of his accident — has helped him make the ride from his starting point in Montana's Beaver Creek River last June.

Both Knotty and Clark have received quite a bit of attention throughout their journey. He is always surprised by the people who comment on his "old-school" technique.

"They see the dugout and they automatically think you are going to do it like they did it 200 years ago," Clark said. "Lewis and Clark would not and could not portage their keel boat, but we have to because these are lakes now."

Now that he has crossed the Gavin's Point Dam, Clark will continue down river to Confluence Point just north of St. Louis, where the Missouri meets the Mississippi. With no destinations in mind, Clark is perfectly happy doing what he does best — admiring the journey.

"I don't care about time," Clark said. "The canoe attracts attention, so I pop into marinas and show her off. People don't get to see something like this every day."

For the past couple years, Clark has been in California, Washington and Colorado chasing redwoods, pines and cottonwoods. He finds donations wherever he can and makes his canoes using only hand tools.

"I go where the trees are," Clark said. "I just pitch my tent and they find me, so I get chopping."

Clark takes everything he needs wherever he goes. He usually carries at least two weeks' worth of supplies, which is no light load. The canoe will weigh anywhere from 600 to 700 pounds fully stocked, he said.

Throughout the year, Clark participates in canoeing events across the country, getting the word out about his canoes and his paddling down the Missouri.

"People tell me all the time that they are living vicariously through me," he said. "I have inspired a few people to get on the river, and that is what I want to do with this journey."

This journey has also seen its share of obstacles. Clark has faced storms and difficult water.

"I've dealt with every kind of storm," he said. "I'm usually very aware of where the water is big and where I can fall back if I need to, but it's easy to get caught."

During his travels, he did run into some major inconveniences. A couple incidences involved a tornado near Pierre and a major storm on Fort Peck Lake in Montana.

"It shows you what could happen and what my canoe can do," he said. "You can't sink her, so I tied myself to the canoe and my paddle to me and waited it out."

Even with his unpredictable occupation, Clark said he loves to share his experiences and teach others to love canoeing as much as he does.

He runs several canoe camps throughout the year for kids, who work together while learning the art and value of following out their own canoe. "Everyone walks away smiling," he said.

Not only is Clark excited about teaching kids a new skill, but he is also teaching them to rely less on technology and appreciate the hands-on work.

"I tell them right away, there is no app for this. We are going to do it one chip at a time and it's going to take a couple months, so let's go," he said. "They are mesmerized by the chopping like I am, and they see the creation that is coming to be."

Clark also has a website and a Facebook page called Dugout Canoe Love, which allows people to follow his excursions and purchase his canoes. He posts pit-stop updates and videos on his YouTube channel. He hopes that the publicity will help him continue doing what he loves.

"I'm to the point where I would like to set up a shop somewhere but I would still need access to big trees," Clark said.

But a steady homestead won't stop the passionate traveler from exploring the world, just as his ancestor did two centuries ago. Clark will continue to make his way down the Missouri River, enjoying his canoe and his voyage all the way.

"Doing this journey, I have run into so many old friends and met new ones," he said. "I love the area and I'll probably visit again, but I don't do the sightseeing; I see it out there."

Scherschligt said.

Candidates will be instructed on several aspects of preparedness such as:

- Fire-Extinguisher training
- First-aid training
- Search of a building
- Determining safe spaces
- Preventative measures

While CERT training is far away from professional EMT training, members can learn to administer the basics, like how to stop bleeding or helping to splint a fracture, until the professionals can arrive to offer extensive care.

Participants will also learn not just the physical aspects of a disaster, but also the emotional ones.

"They learn about the psychology — what it means to go through a disaster," Scherschligt said. "Not everyone has been through a disaster, so instructors go over what people see and how to cope with it."

By using skills learned from both online and in-class exercises, CERT members will be able to assist others in their neighborhood or workplace following an event when professional responders are not immediately available to help. This will act as a support group for Yankton County's emergency staff.

"The CERT team is basically for, if they get called in for the county, (to function as) a back fill to help the emergency services," Scherschligt said. "If we get so overwhelmed with the ambulance and firefighters, CERT members can help out by hauling water and checking firefighters to make sure they are OK."

Once trained, CERT members will receive a certification and be on call to assist county responders. Team members will have monthly meetings to keep updated on their knowledge and skill set. These will involve mock drills, new technique exercises and in-house classes.

"We try to keep them active and interested as much as possible," Scherschligt said. "The training will be interactive. We won't have someone coming in to read information off of a Power-Point to try to get the message across."

Preparedness is an important part of any disaster. The CERT training's purpose is to help others and protect each other when unexpected emergencies arise.

"The most valuable part of being a CERT member is about being a part of the community and being able to help your community...any way you can."
