Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma. Harper had called approval of the project a "no-brainer." And he has suggested that politics played a factor in the Obama administration's delay. The State Department in November ordered that the pipeline be rerouted and subject to further environmental review, drawing cheers from environmental groups and howls from Republicans about lost job creation. Standing with Obama, Harper was measured, but made clear their talks had not changed matters much. "My position, the position of the government of Canada on this issue, is very well known," he said in the brief appearance before reporters. He said Obama has indicated that he has an open mind on the final decision and "I take that as his answer." "You can appreciate that I would not comment on the domestic politics of this issue or any other issue here in the United States," Harper said in response to a reporter's question. The Obama administration's announcement to put off a decision on the pipeline went over badly in Canada, which relies on the U.S. for 97 percent of Canada's energy exports.

Obama also warned congressional Republicans that he would reject any effort to tie the pipeline project or other unrelated issues to the proposed extension of a payroll tax cut that is set to expire on Jan. 1. Obama stopped short of issuing a veto threat, saying he did not believe lawmakers should let it come to that. Supporters say the pipeline could significantly reduce U.S. dependence on Middle Eastern oil while providing thousands of jobs. Opponents say the pipeline would bring "dirty oil" that requires huge amounts of energy to extract. They also worry about possible spills, noting that a current pipeline operated by TransCanada has had several spills in the past year. Ahead of Obama and Harper's meeting, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said approving the pipeline would give Obama an opportunity to follow through on his pledge to make job creation his top priority. "Here's the single greatest shovel-ready project in America, ready to go, and for some reason he's suddenly not interested," McConnell said. Obama and Harper also announced joint agreements to streamline and strengthen border management and regulations. Associated Press writers Julie Pace and Rob Gillies contributed to this story.

Yankton Area Arts Presents Art Of Healing

Yankton Area Arts, in partnership with Avera Sacred Heart Cancer Center, is set to start registering students for our new Art of Healing program beginning in January. Any cancer patient or survivor is eligible to register for the scheduled fine arts classes, and the courses are offered free of charge. Courses will be offered in three-month "terms," and students are allowed to bring a relative, co-survivor, or caregiver to class with them for fun and support. The courses are quite varied as well as flexible, and all of the Teaching Artists are prepared to work with students of any ability. Anyone interested in participating in the program may pick up a course schedule and registration packet from the front desk at either Avera Sacred Heart Cancer Center or Avera Sacred Heart Hospital. Additionally, all pertinent information is available on our website, YanktonAreaArts.org. Some courses have only a single meeting time while others will meet multiple times on a regular basis. If you have any questions, contact Amy at Yankton Area Arts at 665-9754 or yaa@iw.net. Class sizes are limited.
