FAA records indicate it was registered to an Ipswich, S.D., business. Attempts to reach that business were unsuccessful Friday.

John Dahlin, 28, of Sioux Falls, was driving to work when he saw the plane out of the corner of his eye. Dahlin said he thought the pilot was performing a stunt before he realized the plane was out of control.

"It was a spinning, straightnosed dive into the ground," he said.

A split-second later, the plane burst into flames, he said. Dahlin drove closer to the site to try to help as he called 911.

Jack Sundet, 54, a retired Sioux Falls firefighter who used to work at the airport's crash center, said he pulled over after seeing smoke billowing from a field near the airport as he drove home from the Sundet said he pulled out a pair of binoculars and spotted the tail of a plane. The wreckage was compact on the ground, meaning there was no debris for emergency responders to sift through — and likely no survivors.

"Ĭt's like the plane went from nose to tail right into the ground," he said. "The tail was the only thing that was still intact. Everything else was engulfed in flames."

Sioux Falls Mayor Mike Huether said ambulances responded quickly but there was "no chance for survival."

Molinaro said the FAA would investigate and forward its findings to the National Transportation Safety Board. According to NTSB data, the last aviation crash it investigated in Sioux Falls was in Yankton will celebrate masses for the next three weeks for the 35 families who attend the church. Monsignor Hermann served the Sigel parish from 1959-1964, and the parishioners are pleased to see him return.

Church

"Monsignor Hermann was our former pastor many years ago, and we are very grateful he would come back and help us," Hunhoff said. "He is a good friend of our family."

The Sigel parish, which was founded in 1886, has always been a mission church, sharing a pastor with another church. During the past two years, priest shortages have led the Chancery Office to undertake a major planning and review process for its parishes. Following its Christmas mass, the parish will await word from the Chancery on future assignments of priests.

"They're expected to make announcement next year," said Sigel church member Bernie Hunhoff. "Nobody really knows what to expect.'

"I really hope they figure something out because I love attending church there," added Schramm. "I think the smaller congregation builds better relationships and brings us closer together."

With the future uncertain, Bernie encourages people to attend masses at the Sigel church while they still can.

"We don't know when the next masses will be," he said. "Any former parishioners or friends of the parish who want to attend over these next few weeks are more than welcome

While seasonal and holiday depression can take their toll, there are several approaches that can help, including a change in mindset and remaining socially involved, Dracy said.

"Have a realistic perspective. Everything we see isn't necessarily reality," he said. "And get involved. Help someone. Do something where you can kind of pat yourself on the back a little bit and say you're doing something to make someone else's life a little better.'

Dracy said it is also important for people to manage their lives

It's also important for everyone to exercise, and most of us don't. Especially during and after holidays, it's good to start an exercise program to lose a few of the pounds that you gained and to get you through the winter doldrums.

Dracy added that depression brought on by the change in seasons can also be treated.

"We still believe in light therapy for the seasonal-affect part of it," he said.

While many people can deal with these issues on their own, there may come a time when professional support is needed,
