Cattlemen Urged to Comment On CAFO Rule

PIERRE — During the South Dakota Cattlemen's Association's annual convention last week, attendees learned about a proposed rule from the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) that would require Confined Animal Feeding Operations (CAFOs) to report information about their operation to the EPA.

As proposed, the "National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System Concentrated Animal Feeding Operation Reporting Rule" (also referred to as the "CAFO Reporting Rule" or "308 Rule"), would require the submission of a lengthy list of information from all CAFOs, including the operation's location and contact information as well as nutrient management details.

The rule was proposed as part of a lawsuit settlement agreement EPA conducted behind closed doors with environmental groups, excluding representatives from agricultural industries that will be impacted by the rule.

SDCA urges producers to submit comments opposing the proposed rule, particularly EPA's plan to publish the information it collects on its website.

Todd Wilkinson, SDCA 2nd Vice President and cattle feeder from DeSmet observed, "Homeland security has already raised concerns about making CAFO information public. This would allow activists to know exactly where your livestock is located, potentially negatively impacting the health of our cattle herd and food safety."

In addition, SDCA is concerned that, for the purposes of this rule, a CAFO is not clearly defined, allowing for wider interpretation and the potential inclusion of many smaller producers with 300 head of cattle or more.

Wilkinson stated, "Cows and calves in a confined, non-vegetated area during winter feeding may put many, many producers in the recording range, as outlined in the proposed rule."

Producers are encouraged to comment on the rule before the deadline on Tuesday, Dec. 20. Comments can be submitted via the federal eRulemaking Portal at <http://www.regulations.gov> — docket ID No. EPA_HQ-OW-2011-0188.

consumption (MIC), and made 77 illegal-drug arrests and six alcohol-possession arrests. It's a steep rise when compared with 2010, where there were 22 MIC, 31 drug arrests and only two alcohol-possession arrests through the end of October (November totals were not available.)

"I know we are in some tough economic times right now," Kindel said. "On the other hand, it seems to me that the availability of money and resources to kids does not seem to be an issue. Along with the access to the drugs and alcohol, they seem to have the money to be able to do these things. I don't know if it is because more kids are working so they have the availability of money. But when we all know about the economic issues going on, it certainly has not deterred alcohol and drug use among our teenagers."

The administrators said that the increased prevalence in the use of marijuana is particularly troubling to them as well.

(Marijuana) seems to be much more accessible to kids," Kindel said. "Having parties seems to be something that is occurring more and more. We are facing some tough issues and it is not just with the school. I think our community needs to get involved, our civic groups, our parents, our students, as well. We just need to make a concerted effort to do more. What 'more' is, I am not sure."

Currently, when a student is caught using a controlled substance on school grounds, several things happen. The student's parents are called, law enforcement are summoned, the student is charged with the appropriate crime and immediately placed on a short-term suspension. From there, the district reviews each case.

"By state law or school board policy, we could suspend kids for the remainder of the year; we could also expel kids for up to a calendar year," Kindel said. "We have some say in what we want to do based on the situation with the student: Have they been in trouble before? How cooperative have they been? Are they willing to do the tasks in the agreement? Are they serious about wanting to come back to school? Are they serious about working on their work outside of school? There are a lot of factors we talk about before we do determine the number of days that we will long-term suspend kids."

Once the length of the suspension has been approved by the school board, the student then is not on his or her own.

"We provide students an opportunity to complete all their work and turn it in for full credit while serving their suspension," Kindel said. "We require a drug and alcohol assessment. Maybe we should require more with that. We also give them access to the alternative-learning school after school and before school hours. We have provided them a lot of landing boards so there still is help for them."

But the administrators wonder if enough is being done for the students.

"I quite honestly felt that a long-term suspension sufficed and hopefully gave a clear message to kids, parents and whomever that we are very serious about this," Kindel said. "On the other hand, it appears to us that from the beginning of the school year to now that message did not become very clear. We are really trying to find what is going to work here and what is going to help kids."

The thing that is clear, the school district is asking the community for their help in dealing with the issues.

"I don't think this is a consequence of just what the parents and the school are going to do," Kindel said. "It needs to be what the courts are going to do. In the end, the bigger thing is what kind of help or treatment, classes, whatever it might be — what is going to be done to get the kids help?"

Middle School principal Todd Dvoracek said students need to understand that the issue is unacceptable and not just at school, but anywhere they go.

"There are times that kids just make a mistake and they need to learn through that," he said. "That is the biggest thing. It isn't a life sentence, but we do need to have consequences in place for them to still meet and make our schools safe."

Johnke added that message needs to be sent to all students, not just the ones being caught. She warns that if a student sees that another student who was caught did not have any consequences, they may choose to do the same type of behavior.

Dvoracek said he hopes the school district can come together with the community the same way they did when drafting the new attendance policy.

"Wouldn't it be nice a year from now to say, because we all got together and dealt with this we are seeing the numbers of students using dope?" he asked. "In the end it will help and prevent something and we will be on the road to fixing things."

Dvoracek warned parents that the students involved have come from every social economic and household type possible.

"It is a total school population issue," he said. "It is an issue that is affecting everyone, and everybody needs to know about it. It is not just one group of people; it is affecting everyone. To fix it, we have to get everyone involved to find a solution to prevent it rather than just a reaction. These are just the kids that are getting caught. Other kids are getting away with it and hiding it, not just from us, from everyone."

Kindel said that he hopes students will start to develop pride in how they present themselves to the community and at school.

"The most disappointing piece to this, is kids come in and it doesn't seem to bother them for whatever reason," he said. "How about a little Yankton pride? That isn't how you come into your school. It isn't how you conduct yourself. It isn't what your parents, teachers or peers expect. Further more, if it really doesn't bother you, you need some help. If it takes us catching the kid under the influence and there are some consequences along with us forcing them into an assessment and forcing them to get help, then I am ok with it."
