 passed legislation to do so," he said, referring to a measure that extends existing cuts at all income levels.
 Addressing the GOP rank and file by conference call, Boehner said the next move is up to the Senate, which has yet to act on House-passed bills to retain expiring tax cuts at all income levels as well as replace across-the-board spending cuts with targeted savings aimed largely at social programs.

"The House will take this action on whatever the Senate can pass - but the Senate must act," he said, according to a participant in the call.
 At the same time, Boehner told Republican lawmakers the House would convene on Sunday evening.
 The risk of higher milk prices stems from the possibility that existing farm programs will expire at year's end, and neither chamber of Congress has scheduled a vote on even a temporary extension to prevent a spike.
 There have been unverified estimates that the cost to consumers of a gallon of milk could double without action by Congress.

The president flew home from Hawaii overnight after speaking with top congressional leaders.
 Before leaving the White House last Friday, the president had called on lawmakers to pass scaled-down legislation that prevents tax increases for the middle class, raises rates at upper incomes and renews expiring unemployment benefits for the long-term jobless. He said he still supports a more sweeping measure to include spending cuts to reduce deficits, but said they could wait until the new year.
 That capped an unpredictable week in which Boehner pivoted away from comprehensive deficit reduction talks with Obama to an aborted attempt to push legislation through the House that retained existing tax levels except above $1 million. Anti-tax Republicans rebelled at raising rates on million-dollar earners, and Boehner backpedaled and canceled the planned vote.

 Without congressional action, current tax rates will expire on Dec. 31, resulting in a $536 billion tax increase over a decade that would touch nearly all Americans. In addition, the military and other federal departments would have to begin absorbing about $110 billion in spending cuts.

Failure to avoid the "fiscal cliff" doesn't necessarily mean tax increases and spending cuts would become permanent, since the new Congress could pass legislation cancelling them retroactively after it begins its work next year.
 But gridlock through the end of the year would mark a sour beginning to a two-year extension of divided government that resulted from last month's elections in which Obama won a new term and Republicans retained their majority in the House.
 The tax issue in particular has been Obama's first test of muscle after his re-election in November. He ran for a new term calling for higher taxes on the wealthy, and postelection public polls show continued support for his position.

Boehner's decision to support higher rates on million-dollar earners marked a significant break with long-standing GOP orthodoxy, but the resistance among his rank and file so far has trumped him as well as any mandate the president claims.
 Associated Press writers Alan Fram and Jim Kuhnhenn contributed to this report.

 my reports and all of my paperwork are turned in on time, taking the time to go out and visit with landowners and sportsmen, making sure I return phone calls — it's just a courtesy thing," Humphrey said.
 He also teaches elementary school children about his job. Last week, he took an owl to the Scotland school so the kids could see the animal up close, he said.
 "I had it in a little dog kennel and took it in so the kids could come up and look through the door and see it up close," he said. "They obviously didn't get to touch it, but they got to get up close to it and look at the talons, the beak, the feathers, the eyes and things like that."
 Humphrey also uses a critter-crate, which has tanned hides of some of the animals found in South Dakota, to teach kids about the different animals in the state.
 "I show them the hides of a coyote, a fox, a skunk, a raccoon, a badger, a beaver and a muskrat to see if they can guess what it is and tell them where they live and what they eat and what parts of the state they can be found in," he said. "At the end, I'll lay everything out on a table and they can come up and touch them and feel which one is the softest and the prettiest, so they get a chance to be hands-on."
 For Humphrey, wildlife conservation is about preserving the land for future generations.
 "I enjoy spending my free time hunting, fishing, camping and trapping," he said. "I have two boys at home and they're starting to show a lot of interest in those things. It's important for me to be able to give my part to preserve those wildlife populations so that future generations can experience and enjoy it the way I have."
