USD Earn NCATE Accreditation

VERMILLION — The University of South Dakota School of Education was awarded full accreditation through Fall 2018 by the National Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education (NCATE).

According to the Council for the Accreditation of Educator Preparation (CAEP), which oversees NCATE accreditation, USD's School of Education continues to meet the rigorous standards set by the professional education community. The accreditation announcement followed a review of the School of Education's self-study report submitted in November 2011 and a site visit by an NCATE BOE review team in April 2013.

The USD School of Education has been fully accredited by NCATE since 1956. The School of Education holds NCATE accreditation for its initial teacher preparation program and advanced preparation for teachers and other professionals.

"The USD School of Education is proud to be an NCATE accredited institution — the highest professional standards established for schools and colleges," said Hee-sook Choi, interim dean of the School of Education. "Achieving reaccreditation is further evidence that USD's education and related professional programs are maintaining cutting-edge training with rigor thanks to our outstanding faculty, high standards and hardworking students who are dedicated to making their educational experience a success."

New Report Examines American Indian College Attendance

RAPID CITY — A new report takes a look at the college-going challenges faced by American Indian students in South Dakota, and recommends specific strategies to support those students and ensure their success in post-secondary education.

"This is a growing demographic for South Dakota," Jack Warner, executive director and CEO of the South Dakota Board of Regents, said. "We have made it a priority for the public universities to recruit more American Indian students and to ensure that they are successful in our system."

To that end, a working group composed of campus officials recently focused particular attention on American Indian students' perspectives about college-going activity in South Dakota.

An interpretive study, conducted by the regents' institutional researcher, Daniel Palmer, used a focus group design to interview 49 current American Indian undergraduate students enrolled at four South Dakota public universities.

Palmer found that financial challenges, lack of mentorship, the fear of leaving home and family, and fears of culture shock and alienation all impact American Indian students and their college-going plans. On the other hand, these students cited support of their families, setting an example, serving to their tribe, and beating the odds as primary reasons to pursue post-secondary education.

Based on those findings, the working group offered several recommendations for improved access and success by American Indian students. Among its recommendations:

- Improved outreach to high schools. Campuses must be more vigorous in reaching out to native high school student, and doing it in a meaningful way. A family-centered approach was recommended, which may include information sharing and mentorship, as well as providing more help to students and their families to complete admission and scholarship paperwork.
- Additional strategies.

Other suggestions include providing more scholarship and grant aid, expanding American Indian student centers and programs, publicizing distance education opportunities, and enhancing the American Indian cultural footprint on all campuses.

- Focus on retention. Colleges must develop academic programs and student services that better reflect the family-centered orientation of tribal life. This includes building a stronger sense of community for American Indian students by cultivating deeper relationships between students, campuses, and their communities.

Key To Winter Driving: Stay Informed, Says SDDOT

PIERRE — Winter weather is upon us, and the South Dakota Department of Transportation is reminding motorists to stay informed, slow down and drive safely.

Weather in South Dakota is anything but predictable, and a traveler's first action should be to visit www.safetravelusa.com/sd or dial 511 for the most current road condition information.

The South Dakota 511 mobile application for Android (iPhone app coming soon) provides the same information as the SafeTravelUSA website, but in a compatible format with mobile phones.

Another feature on the SafeTravelUSA website is ClearPath511. Users can sign up to receive text messages, emails or Twitter alerts to road closures, no travel advisories and flooding information.

New this year for the SDDOT is a Twitter account, @SouthDakotaDOT, and a Facebook account, <https://www.facebook.com/southdakotadot>. In the event weather necessitates an interstate road closure, updates will be posted on these accounts as well.

Being informed is the first step to staying safe when driving in inclement weather. State officials also want you to treat driving as your main priority. Slow down, do not use cruise control, refrain from using electronic devices that can be distracting, drive with your headlights on (not daytime running lights — manually turn them on), and pay attention to your surroundings, especially traffic around you.
