Easy To See Where Coaching Rants Could Happen
Have you watched the video of Southern Illinois coach Barry Hinson's epic rant from Tuesday night? Where he called his players "uncoachable" and a "bunch of mama's boys"? If not, it's worth a view, if nothing else for the comedy.
Such tirades — and I wouldn't exactly call this one a "tirade" — are becoming more and more common in the sports world. Especially when media reporters like myself are using both tape recorders and video cameras.
Everything you say after a game is being recorded, whether it be in a formal post-game press conference at the University of South Dakota or at a smaller school like Mount Marty College.
In my opinion, though, the reason these tirades should become 'news' more because of their refreshing nature than their content — unless, of course, a coach goes on an explosive-filled spout.
Let me take you inside the world of post-game press conferences.
At the larger schools, coaches go through what is referred to as a 'cooling down period,' typically after a short meeting with their players and an obligated radio interview. At that point, sports information officials will bring the coaches into a secluded room.

Coaches then usually start with an opening statement, which most of the time are canned "It was a great game" or a "That was a great team win against a really good team" answers. Not sexy, right?
Media members record or type those, mostly to use if you're up against a deadline. But typically, we wait for the traditionally Q&A session — that's when we can ask about the loss, about the win, about so-and-so's game, or certain plays, whatever the case is.
It's following those questions where coaches would be free to go on a rant like Hinson did. You give them one spark and they could go off. Especially after an intense, tightly-contested game where their team loses.
Of course, it depends on the question, and in some cases, the person asking the question.
If you're known as a person who "ruffles feathers," you're going to elicit emotional responses. Or, if your question is more of an opinion statement, be ready for such responses — which, I can imagine is why many national reporters format their questions in that way.
Personally, I've never been a person to toss out opinions and expect responses. I'll ask a coach a direct question, they'll answer and we'll both move.
I've never encountered such a rant as Hinson's from Tuesday, but I could totally understand where it could happen. And then, we'd have a follow-up story to deal with, right?
