reduce placements in state or private facilities, from 314 to 208 during the 2017 budget year, and the number would decline to 175 in 2018, 146 in 2019 and 127 in 2020.

Depending upon whose estimates are used, the first full year of the program could cost about $260,000 more because of the up-front expenses for community services, according to a fiscal note prepared by the Legislative Research Council.

The net reductions in expenses would begin to accumulate in the years after, according to the LRC analysis, as fewer youths are committed to facilities.

The savings gradually would increase to $1.2 million in the second full year, then $2.7 million and $3.7 million in full years three and four.

The LRC report notes that Pew Charitable Trusts through its public safety performance project “determined the average annual out-of-home placement cost for state facilities, detention and jail, and private placements was $59,281, based on program cost data provided by the Department of Corrections.”

Basically the Legislature, the courts and the governor want community intervention rather than commitments to be used whenever possible.

New state laws that take effect Jan. 1 limit when a state court may commit a child to the state Department of Corrections for cases of delinquency or CHINS – child in need of supervision – or for probation violations

The alternative approach moving into place calls for community response teams to make recommendations for community treatment options when there is a potential commitment to DOC. The judge on the case may accept, reject or modify the recommendation.

Probation options for the courts now will be limited generally to four months maximum or eight months in instances of intensive probation, with an overall combined limit of 12 months.

The court system is establishing rules in January for a grid of responses to probation violations.

State law also now calls for four common offenses – petty theft; intentional damage to property less than $400; under age purchase, possession or consumption of alcohol by youths younger than 18; and truancy – to be handled outside the normal juvenile courts process and would be punished as citations carrying a maximum $100 fine and restitution.

Overseeing the reform efforts is a 19-member council appointed by the governor, the Supreme Court chief justice, the Legislature's majority leaders and the attorney general.

The oversight council's chairman is Greg Sattizahn, administrator for the state Unified Judicial System. Vice chairman is Jim Seward, the governor's legal counsel and a former county prosecutor.

Kuhl

career side of things, I was looking forward to a position where you concentrate on a community and pull those elements together.”

He added that he was also looking for a better place to raise his family.

“On a personal note, we had a young family and my wife and I, both having come from this part of the country, knew there was something better for raising a family,” he said. “Yankton is a great place, so we came here with that goal in mind and we’ve accomplished that.” Yankton City Manager Amy Nelson said that Kuhl's become engrained in the city's history.

“(He) has been involved with everything in his tenure from parks to streets to sanitation and engineering,” Nelson said. Kuhl said he's had a busy career in Yankton.

“In 25 years, I've gotten to be involved with lots of engineers, contractors, (city) commissions and city managers to cover everything from the airport to the wastewater treatment plant” he said.

He cited the renovation of the wastewater treatment plant as one of the highlights of his career — and an example of how prolonged a major project can be.

“We did a complete renovation of the wastewater treatment plant,” he said. “It took 10 years. It's not something that happens overnight. We converted that from a trickling filter to an extended aeration process. ... It's been successful.”

Another highlight for Kuhl has been bringing the Chan Gurney Municipal Airport up to modern standards.

“Twenty-five years ago, we were looking at World War II-vintage runways, electrical systems and everything,” he said. “Since that time, we've done a complete renovation. We've got what's classified as a regional airport with a 6,000-foot runway that accommodates large airplanes, and not everybody can do that.” He also said construction and reconstruction of many elements of infrastructure throughout the city and creating a digital map for infrastructure were great accomplishments for the City of Yankton over the during his time.

Nelson said it's hard to pin down a short list of highlights from Kuhl's career.

“Virtually any public improvement that's gone on in the last 20 years, he's been involved with in some regard,” she said. “It's kind of hard to talk about specific highlights because there's just been so many things he's been involved with.”

While Kuhl's last day may be Dec. 31, Kuhl said he's not quite checked out from the position that he's held since 1999.

“One of the things we've done in the last 25 years is reconstructing all of the bridges in town, with the exception of two that are currently downgraded in their carrying capacity for trucks,” he said. “We met (last Tuesday) to coordinate with the state DOT (Department of Transportation) and the bridge engineer that is helping us with those projects. That is the Cedar St. bridge renovation and the Pine St. bridge replacement. We're positioning the city so that we're strong candidates for this year's round of (Bridge Improvement Grants).”

The City of Yankton will formally apply for the grants in February, and officials should know if they've been accepted in April.

Kuhl said he's been happy to work with the city staff.

“I've got a tremendous staff here that's developed over the years,” he said. “They're very accomplished and they make these things happen — everything from operations out at the airport, snow removal to design and construction.”

He added he's keeping his plans open in retirement — but will keep an eye on the city.

“It's wide open,” he said. “I don't have any definite plans at all. I've got a lot of interests and I'm going to pursue them. It's hard to just walk away from the community, so I'll be watching carefully as it goes on.”
