Prenatal Care Becomes Big Issue For Neb. Lawmakers

BY NATE JENKINS
Associated Press Writer

LINCOLN, Neb. — Is providing state-funded health care to pregnant, illegal immigrants a cost or a savings? The right or wrong thing to do?

Interviews with a cross-section of Nebraska lawmakers show many think it could be a smart financial move and the correct moral path. Gov. Dave Heineman, meanwhile, is staying away from the controversial topic, letting lawmakers take the lead on what is shaping up to be one of the biggest issues of the current legislative session.

Some members of the governor's own Republican Party aren't hesitating when asked if the state should continue to pay for the health care of pregnant, illegal immigrants who can't afford it on their own.

"This isn't an immigration issue; it's a pro-life issue," said Sen. Tony Fulton of Lincoln, a Republican candidate for state treasurer. "It could cost money and it concerns me."

But, he added, the state has consistently recognized that unborn children are people that should be cared for.

Other lawmakers said they're concerned about the cost of continuing to provide state-funded care, but that doing so would likely be cheaper than paying for later health problems caused by a lack of prenatal care.

Children born in the U.S. are legal citizens, no matter if their parents are here illegally.

"This unborn child's life could be at risk and when children are born here they are citizens," said Sen. Galen Hadley of Kearney, a Republican.

The issue of prenatal care for illegal immigrants emerged in December, when U.S. officials told the state it had been breaking federal rules by allowing unborn children — not just their mothers — to qualify for Medicaid. Nebraska is believed to be the only state that allows that.

For three decades, the practice allowed women — legal residents and illegal immigrants who didn't qualify for Medicaid — to get Medicaid-covered care because their children qualified. The long-standing rule also allowed more women to be covered because the unborn baby was counted as another person who would stretch a family's resources.

Nebraska officials are reviewing whether about 5,200 pregnant, legal residents potentially affected by the federal order might still qualify for Medicaid even if their unborn children don't. The cases of 998 pregnant, illegal immigrants are not being reviewed, however, because Medicaid does not cover services for illegal immigrants.

A preliminary plan from a group of lawmakers trying to ensure both groups of women continue to get prenatal care hinges on using the Children's Health Insurance Program. Like Medicaid, it is funded with both state and federal dollars. Unlike Medicaid, unborn children of pregnant mothers qualify for coverage.

Fourteen states take advantage of the coverage. Legislative fiscal analysts say using the program for the unborn children of illegal immigrants would cost the state about $5.7 million this year, which includes prenatal, delivery and postpartum costs. If the state was allowed to continue using Medicaid, the cost would be about $7 million.

Last fiscal year, a total of 2,846 pregnant, illegal immigrants received a range of Medicaid services.

the blocks as a way to contribute to the hometown celebration. This volunteer wishes to remain anonymous and has so far kept up with the orders.

It takes up to 14 days to get an order back and the artist keeps track of the time for each block. An average for the total project is about 5-6 hours. There are two coats of primer and three coats of top paint for each block.

"The local lumberyard is very helpful and cut the boards for us," Arduser said. She takes several to the painter so there are some on hand whenever the orders come in.

Arduser hopes that when the requests pick up as the weather warms, the center members will be called into action. There are three sizes to choose from, ranging from 2 x 2 feet to 8 x 8 feet.

The group still has to sell a large quilt block made from two 4 x 8 sheets of half-inch plywood but have had some positive responses from rural residents.

The center has several books with samples of quilt blocks for people to study. Once a block is chosen, that pattern will not be used again; a copy of each quilt design chosen is kept in a folder by the director's desk.

The first blocks already staked around town offer quite a colorful explosion against the deep snow banks.

"They can also come in with their own favorite quilt pattern," Arduser said. "One carpenter in town came in with a pattern called 'Carpenter's Square.'"

When a business or individual comes in with their pattern choice, Arduser scans it into the center computer and prints out a couple of copies. She tells them to take them home and experiment with different color combinations. Sometimes, it takes them only a day or two, and some think quite a while before deciding on a choice.

The parish of St. Jane de Frances Catholic Church chose "Lily of the Field" for one block and a pattern called "St. Paul" for another. Arduser said there are religious choices as well as traditional patterns.

If a business needs help, Arduser and others at the center have already found some quilting patterns to fit the bill. For the town welder, she has a pattern called "Anvil." Another pattern called "The Drunkard's Path" would work for one of the several bars in town, and the bank ordered "Borrow and Lend" for its display. A resident who flies a small airplane picked the "Airplane II" pattern. Resident LaDonna Leiting chose the "Double L" design.

"We are having a lot of fun with this project," Arduser said. "We have painted some for Christmas presents and a few were birthday requests."

The blocks can be staked on the front lawn, hung on an outdoor building or attached to a porch rail.

As the weather warms up, the center's senior members will be talking to all the downtown businesses, neighbors, family and friends promoting the quilt blocks — reminding everyone Randolph's Q-centennial is just around the corner.
