DEBUT

memories and information in the piece. Some of them are only things we will get and some of them are things everyone will pick up on."

Tomkins said that he has found working with his brother to be a great experience.

"Performers do not think about music like composers do," he said. "When I am writing a piece of music, I am thinking in terms of a color, an effect or an idea I am trying to get across. A lot of times, that is at odds with the way a performer traditionally approaches a piece."

He explained that because a performer must be rigorous in keeping good rhythm and being in tone, they place less emphasis on an idea of clarity and more on execution. For the composer, he said, they think more in terms of textures and color and overall experience.

"When you get a situation, like with my brother, where he is able to do both of those things, you get something very special going on," Tomkins said. "I know my brother and I know the kind of music he likes. I know he loves a lot of counterpoint, which is multiple melodies going on at once to create a texture. He loves intricate music, so I wanted to give him a chance to have something he would love to play."

Tomkins said that he enjoys putting references to other things in his music and enjoys seeing if the audience will catch the references.

"The first thing I would say is, come to the concert," he said. "After that, I would say I am a big fan of melody and harmony. At the end of the second movement, I definitely quoted (the 'Star Trek' movie) 'The Wrath of Khan.' So, there are little things like that in there. Some of it, I expect the audience to listen for and get, some of it, if I point it out, they will get it. But, some of it I am just curious if they will get it. I would say come and listen to it and it will be a lot of fun."
