Senate Panel Approves Watershed Districts Bill

P&D Staff Reports

PIERRE — The South Dakota Senate Agriculture and Natural Resources Committee on Tuesday gave unanimous support to a bill that would create certain watershed districts in the James River valley to deal with continued water problems caused by increased moisture in the state over the past few years.

Senate Bill 169 was passed by a vote of 9-0 in the Senate committee.

If it gets approval by the full Legislature, SB 169 will establish the James River Watershed District which "may include any conservation district, or any watershed district that is formed under any conservation district, located in Aurora, Beadle, Bon Homme, Brown, Clark Davison, Day, Douglas, Edmunds, Faulk, Hand, Hanson, Hutchinson, Hyde, Jerauld, Kingsbury, Marshall, McCook, McPherson, Miner, Sanborn, Spink and Yankton counties," according to the language of the bill.

The watershed district, if formed, would have taxing authority to raise funds to pay for projects that will help deal with the water problems. It would be made up of a board of managers who would come from conservation or watershed districts which vote to be included in the regional watershed district.

The bill was amended in the Senate committee to also establish a Regional Watershed Advisory Task Force that would advise the watershed district on "matters relating to drainage, erosion, flood control, reclamation, environmental protection, and improvement of lands, soils, waters, and all other authorized purposes," according to the amendment.

The bill will move to the Senate floor for consideration at a later date.

Marty Sites Added To National Register Of Historic Places

PIERRE — The Marty Indian Gymnasium and St. Therese Hall in Marty is one of two South Dakota properties added in January to the National Register of Historic Places, according to the South Dakota State Historical Society.

Also added was the Hardy Ranger Station in Lawrence

The National Register is the official federal list of properties identified as important in American history, architecture, archaeology, engineering and culture. The State Historic Preservation Office of the State Historical Society at the Cultural Heritage Center in Pierre works in conjunction with the National Park Service, which oversees the National Register program.

The Marty Indian School, formerly known as Marty Mission School, is located in Marty on the Yankton Reservation. The gymnasium, built in 1935, is a threestory brick building in the Stripped Classicism style, which was popular at the time. Designed in the Art Deco style using brick and limestone, the fourstory St. Therese Hall was completed in 1945. These buildings are listed on the National Register in the areas of Education, Art, Religion, Ethnic Heritage and Architecture. The school's buildings embody important historical trends about 1930s school architecture, early 20th century Sioux artwork, the development of the mission and community around Marty, as well as the history of Catholic missions to American Indian tribes in South Dakota.

South Dakota's history is rich in American Indian culture, pioneer life and change," said Jay D. Vogt, state historic preservation officer and director of the State Historical Society. "Properties listed on the National Register are important for their role in South Dakota's culture, heritage and history. And when properties get listed, it shows that their owners take pride in their role in preserving that culture, heritage and history."

Buildings, sites, structures and objects at least 50 years old possessing historical significance may qualify for the National Register, according to Vogt. Properties must also maintain their historic location, design, materials and association. Listing on the National Register does not place any limitations on private property owners by the federal government.

surrounding area."

In that regard, rural residents will not only enjoy access to the city-owned facility but also pay the same rental rates as city residents, Tjaden said.

The change from a gym-annex to a community center had its roots when the Freeman Public School system brought all of its students under one roof, said City Administrator Dennis Nelsen.

"The old elementary school was torn down (in 2009), and the school district constructed a new elementary building where the high school campus is located," he

The school board and administration approached the city about taking over the unattached gymannex which remained standing, Nelsen said. The council agreed to the change, and ownership was transferred to the city, he said.

The gym-annex had no heating and cooling when the city assumed ownership, Nelsen said. The facility never had cooling, and the heating had been provided by ine now-demolished elementary school, he said.

In order to resolve the issue and to prepare the community center for year-round use, the city pursued and received a state energy-efficiency grant of $369,375 for installing a geothermal system, Nelsen said.

'This (geothermal) project wouldn't have been done without the grant," Tjaden said, noting the grant kept the total facility costs

In determining the city's financial contribution toward restoration, the council followed the same formula used for the new emergency center and new library during the past decade, Tjaden said.

The city pledges up to $90,000 and serves as the conduit for receiving state and federal money, the mayor said. The projects also draw upon private funding, he

"It's a model that we have used," he said. "With limited funds, everybody has to buy in. If not enough people buy in, then it won't be done.'

A key part of that "buy-in" for the community center was private donations totaling $142,224.86, Tjaden said. The city appointed a fundraising committee that reported to the city council at its monthly meetings, he said.

Another key development came when the contractor, Westmar Construction, covered the $30,000 difference when bids came in higher than expected, the mayor council meeting, Tjaden appointed a five-member government board to guide the community center's operation. In turn, the mayor and council will oversee the board members.

The government board members, who serve two-year terms, consist so far of city councilmen Charly Waltner and Royce Breneman, along with city residents John Koch and Norm Kaufman. The mayor is waiting for an answer from the fifth person, a rural resident, invited to serve on the

The west half of the building contains the basketball court and bleachers, while the east half includes the lunchroom and classrooms. The facility has new ceilings, and the stage stands between the two halves of the building.

With the community center now ready for use, Tjaden sees tremendous potential.

"We put the feeler out about what we can dream (for the building) and what it can be in the future," he said. "We could look at the seating, improve the stage for plays, get a movie screen and hold movie weekends, that kind of thing, to make it more than just a big space for occasional use.'

The idea of showing movies received a major boost when the Lorain Theatre at Armour provided its old projector to the Freeman Community Center, Tjaden said.

"Armour did us a big favor," he said. "They received a grant for a digital movie projector, so we got their old one.

The mayor also foresees the community center providing tremendous possibilities for business recruitment and economic development.

"The east end, with its classrooms, provides an area for business incubators and adult education. We could help businesses get on their feet," he said. "We have several manufacturers up here (in Freeman) who need help, and we are talking with an area technical training center. We have this building, so why not get together and try to marry up some deals where people can get education and get employed?

The new community center offers much more space than the city would have pursued if starting from scratch, Tjaden said.

Truthfully, if the city was going to build a brand new community center, it would be half as big. But the building was already there, and it was available for Freeman," he said. "This (facility) should be another avenue of entertainment and expansion for business in our
