Medicaid

there will be approximately 30,000 South Dakota residents left uninsured.

“Some of the lowest income residents across the state will not be eligible for certain aspects of the health care reform,” Smolnisky said. “In some cases, if someone has an income that is too low, they will not qualify for federal subsidies to buy insurance and their income would also be too high to qualify for South Dakota Medicaid, if the state chooses not to expand the program.”

She added that the expansion decision might be purely political for legislators.

“If South Dakota does decide to expand, and then they don't like the results, they can choose to change back to the old Medicaid program,” Smolnisky said. “There is also a broad array of folks out there, both providers and consumers of health care, that are in support of the expansion. However, regardless of the decision, health care reform and Medicaid must continue to be monitored by officials.”

She said the Medicaid expansion decision would primarily impact the poor, adults without children, non-elderly and parents who are between 50 and 100 percent of the federal poverty level.

“It makes economic sense for the state to expand the Medicaid program from the perspective that they would get a 10 to 1 match from the federal government for the program,” Smolnisky said. “It brings money into the state to provide care that is needed for poor people. If, down the line, the government can no longer afford to give funding to states for the Medicaid program, South Dakota can switch back to the old program.”

There will be a public hearing on Medicaid expansion today (Wednesday) in Pierre at 10 a.m. The hearing will also contain a period of public testimony where South Dakota citizens can voice their opinions on the Medicaid expansion decision to legislators.
