Law

“Have we now reached a point in this nation and in this great state where we are now ready to say to our public, to our parents and more importantly to our students that our state has gotten so bad and so unsafe and so dangerous that we must now attend school in an armed fortress?” Marlette asked the committee.

Marlette said he believes only Utah, Kansas and Texas have programs like the one being proposed in South Dakota. Colorado, Wyoming and Nebraska have rejected such proposals, he said.

Under the bill, school personnel in a so-called School Sentinel program would not be forced to take part in training. It would also require local law enforcement agencies to approve a school's program.

Republican Rep. Scott Craig of Rapid City — the measure's main House sponsor — said 24 other states have similar programs. He said arming school personnel would be just one part of a comprehensive security plan. Lawmakers have said some schools need to improve security at entrances and boost counseling to identify troubled students.

But Craig said making the program law could deter assaults because potential attackers would be afraid to meet armed resistance inside school buildings. Attackers target schools now because they know the buildings are gun-free zones, he said.

Before approving the bill, the committee removed a section that could have allowed school boards to keep decisions about the program secret. Tieszen said a decision to start a program should be made in a public meeting, but details could be set in a closed meeting.
