Debate Swirls Over Martin Luther King Quote

NEW YORK (AP) — “I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin but by the content of their character.”

This sentence spoken by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. has been quoted countless times as expressing one of America's bedrock values, its language almost sounding like a constitutional amendment on equality.

Yet today, 50 years after King shared this vision during his most famous speech, there is considerable disagreement over what it means.

The quote is used to support opposing views on politics, affirmative action and programs intended to help the disadvantaged. Just as the words of the nation's founders are parsed for modern meanings on guns and abortion, so are King's words used in debates over the proper place of race in America.

As we mark the King holiday, what might he ask of us in a time when both the president and a disproportionate number of people in poverty are black? Would King have wanted us to completely ignore race in a “color-blind” society? To consider race as one of many factors about a person? And how do we discern character?

15-Year-Old Boy Fatally Shoots Five People In N.M.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) — A 15-year-old boy fatally shot two adults and three children at a home near Albuquerque, authorities said Sunday.

The teenager was arrested on murder and other charges in connection with the shootings Saturday night at the home in a rural area 10 miles southwest of downtown Albuquerque, Bernalillo County sheriff's spokesman Aaron Williamson said.

The victims' identities haven't been released, and the boy's motive and connection to the five victims weren't immediately known. Williamson said investigators were trying to determine if the victims were related.

“We are trying to identify the victims,” Williamson said.

Each victim suffered more than one gunshot wound, he said.

More Than 80 Dead In Saharan Siege

BY AOMAR OUALI AND ELAINE GANLEY
 Associated Press

ALGIERS, Algeria — The death toll from the terrorist siege at a natural gas plant in the Sahara climbed past 80 on Sunday as Algerian forces searching the refinery for explosives found dozens more bodies, many so badly disfigured it was unclear whether they were hostages or militants, a security official said.

Algerian special forces stormed the plant on Saturday to end the four-day siege, moving in to thwart what government officials said was a plot by the Islamic extremists to blow up the complex and kill all their captives with mines sown throughout the site.

In a statement, the Masked Brigade, the group that claimed to have masterminded the takeover, warned of more such attacks against any country backing France's military intervention in neighboring Mali, where the French are trying to stop an advance by Islamic extremists.

“We stress to our Muslim brothers the necessity to stay away from all the Western companies and complexes for their own safety, and especially the French ones,” the statement said.

Algeria said after Saturday's assault by government forces that at least 32 extremists and 23 hostages were killed. On Sunday, Algerian bomb squads sent in to blow up or defuse the explosives found 25 more bodies, said the security official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation.

“These bodies are difficult to identify. They could be the bodies of foreign hostages or Algerians or terrorists,” the official said.

In addition, a wounded Romanian who had been evacuated died, raising the overall death toll to at least 81.

“Now, of course, people will ask questions about the Algerian response to these events, but I would just say that the responsibility for these deaths lies squarely with the terrorists who launched a vicious and cowardly attack,” British Prime Minister David Cameron said. Three Britons were killed and another three were feared dead.

The dead hostages were also known to include at least one American as well as Filipino and French workers. Nearly two dozen foreigners by some estimates were unaccounted for.

It was unclear whether anyone was rescued in the final assault on the complex, which is run by the Algerian state oil company along with BP and Norway's Statoil.

Two private Algerian TV stations and an online news site said security forces scouring the plant found five militants hiding out and learned that three others had fled. That information could not be immediately confirmed by security officials.

Authorities said the bloody takeover was carried out Wednesday by 32 men from six countries, under the command from afar of the one-eyed Algerian bandit Moktar Belmoktar, founder of the Masked Brigade, based in Mali. The attacking force called itself “Those Who Sign in Blood.”

The Masked Brigade said Sunday the attack was payback against Algeria for allowing over-flights of French aircraft headed to Mali and for closing its long border with Mali. In an earlier communication, the Brigade claimed to have carried out the attack in the name of al-Qaida.

Armed with heavy machine guns, rocket launchers, missiles and grenades, the militants singled out foreign workers at the plant, killing some of them on the spot and attaching explosive belts to others.

Algeria's tough and uncompromising response to the crisis was typical of its take-no-prisoners approach in confronting terrorists, favoring military action over negotiation. Algerian military forces, backed by attack helicopters, launched two assaults on the plant, the first one on Thursday.

The militants had “decided to succeed in the operation as planned, to blow up the gas complex and kill all the hostages,” Algerian Communications Minister Mohamed Said told state radio.

Norwegian Foreign Minister Espen Barth Eide said the terrorists had tried to blow up the plant on Saturday but managed only to start a small fire. “That's when they started to execute hostages, and the special forces intervened,” Eide said. Norway's Statoil said five Norwegians were still missing.

An audio recording of Algerian security forces speaking with the head of the kidnapers, Abdel Rahman al-Nigiri, on the second day of the drama indicated the hostage-takers were trying to organize a prisoner swap.

“You see our demands are so easy, so easy if you want to negotiate with us,” al-Nigiri said in the recording broadcast by Algerian television. “We want the prisoners you have, the comrades who were arrested and imprisoned 15 years ago. We want 100 of them.”

In another phone call, al-Nigiri said that half the militants had been killed by the Algerian army on Thursday and that he was ready to blow up the remaining hostages if security forces attacked again. An organization that monitors videos from radicals posted one showing al-Nigiri with what appeared to be an explosive belt around his waist.

The Algerians' use of force raised an international outcry from some countries worried about their citizens.

But French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius said Sunday on French television: “The terrorists ... they're the ones to blame.”

David Plouffe, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, said that al-Qaida and al-Qaida-affiliated groups remain a threat in North Africa and other parts of the world, and that the U.S. is determined to help other countries destroy those networks.

Speaking on “Fox News Sunday,” Plouffe said the tragedy in Algeria shows once again “that all across the globe countries are threatened by terrorists who will use civilians to try and advance their twisted and sick agenda.”

Flu Outbreak Kills More Children And Hospitalizes More Seniors

BY TONY PUGH
 McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — In the deadliest week yet for the nation's stubborn influenza outbreak, nine more children died of flu-related illness last week, bringing the season's pediatric death toll to 29, as local health officials nationwide continue to take protective measures to stop the spread of the virus.

At the halfway point of the 2012-2013 flu season, the number of child deaths has nearly matched the 34 that died in the mild 2011-2012 flu season, U.S. health officials said Friday.

More than half of the children who have died were not vaccinated and most had underlying health problems that made them more susceptible to the virus, said Dr. Tom Frieden, director of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

But it's the elderly who continue to bear the brunt of the epidemic. Hospitalization rates for people ages 65 and over with laboratory-confirmed influenza jumped to 82 per 100,000 last week, from 70 per 100,000 the previous week, and about 50 per 100,000 during the last week of 2012. The overall hospitalization rate for the entire U.S. population was 19 per 100,000.

In a conference call with reporters, Frieden said the number of flu cases, as well as hospitalizations and deaths, are expected to rise as the epidemic progresses. “It's shaping up to be a worse than average (flu) season and a bad season for the elderly,” he said. “Seasonal influenza always takes the heaviest toll on seniors when it comes to deaths. ... In general, we estimate that about 90 percent of flu-related deaths are in people 65 and older.”

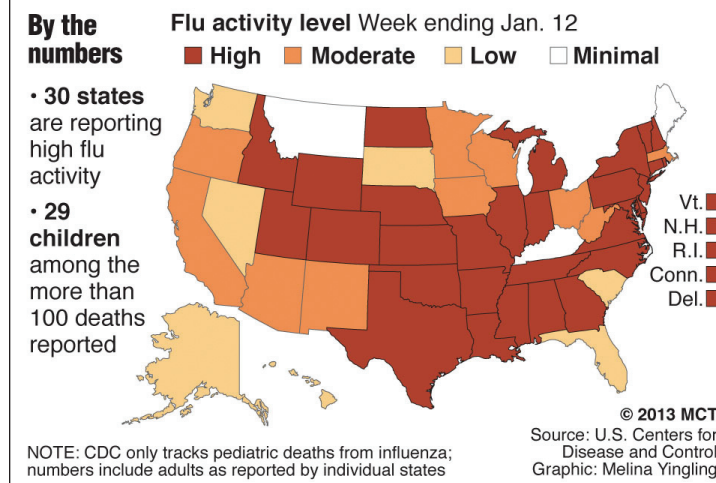

Making matters worse, Frieden said, health care providers aren't offering the antiviral medications, Tamiflu and Relenza, at appropriate levels to reduce patient suffering.

After vaccination, both medications are viewed as the second line of defense against the flu because they shorten the duration of the virus and can cut the flu death rate by 50 percent to 75 percent when taken within two days of developing symptoms.

“Maybe as many as a third or half of people who are hospitalized with flu aren't getting prompt treatment with antivirals ... and that can have a big impact on reducing serious illness and death,” the CDC director said.

Antivirals should be given to high-risk patients with flu symptoms even if rapid flu tests come back negative for the virus because of the prevalence of false negatives, Frieden said. High-risk patients include the elderly; infants and young children; and people with asthma, diabetes, heart disease, lung disease, neurological disorders and other underlying medical conditions.

While the total number of U.S. flu deaths won't be tallied until the end of the flu season, the virus typically kills thousands and sometimes tens of thousands of Americans each year. Over a 25-year period, the number of U.S. flu deaths has varied annually from 3,000 to 49,000, said Dr. Joseph Bresee, chief of the influenza division of the CDC's Epidemiology and Prevention Branch.

About 129 million doses of flu vaccine already have been distributed nationwide. Roughly 1 million doses are administered every day during flu season, Frieden said.

While reports of spot vaccine shortages continue to crop up, the five companies that make the vaccine for the U.S. have another 10 million doses in the pipeline, so providers should still be able to order it and consumers should still be able to find it with a little checking around.

People having trouble finding the vaccine can use the ZIP code-based “flu vaccine finder” at www.flu.gov.

The 145 million doses produced for the entire season is twice the supply available several years ago, said Margaret A. Hamburg, commissioner of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

After beginning a month earlier than usual, the flu season shows signs of slowing in some areas of the country, while increasing out west.

Besides treating patients, hospitals are taking precautions to protect visitors, as well. As of Friday, 30 states and New York City reported high levels of influenzalike illness among outpatient hospital visitors. That's up from 24 last week.

The Central Georgia Health System in Macon this week required that children be at least age 12 or older to visit patients at three area hospitals in order to protect patients, visitors and staff from possible infection.

“Our policies and actions are designed to protect those at greatest risk during the flu season,” said Dr. Delanor Doyle, chief medical information officer at the Medical Center of Central Georgia.

The share of deaths caused by pneumonia and influenza in a weekly CDC analysis of 122 cities reached 8.3 percent last week, up from 7.3 percent the previous week. Both levels top the 7.2 percent threshold for an epidemic.

On the positive side, the share of outpatient hospital visits for influenzalike illness was 4.6 percent last week, down from a recently adjusted figure of 4.8 percent the previous week.
