RESOLUTION OF APPRE-CIATION

The following Resolution was proposed by Register of Deeds Brian Hunhoff in recognition of outgoing Yankton County Commissioner Mark Johnson. WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson began his service on the Yankton

County Board of Commissioners on January 1, 2005; and WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson is moving from Yankton County to begin a new career; and WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson has resigned his position on the Yankton County Board of Commissioners, effective December 31, 2013; and WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson has been a hard-working county commissioner who performed his duties in a professional and responsible manner; and WHEREAS. Mark E. Johnson consistently strived to improve the technological capabilities of the Yankton County Commission and other county offices; and

WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson often shared his land surveying expertise; his experience with the County Search and Rescue Team; and his knowledge of civil engineering issues for the benefit of the Yankton County Commission;

WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson served Yankton County on several boards and committees, including the County Technology Committee; County Trail Committee; Senior Center Board of Directors; E911 Committee; Chamber Governmental Affairs Committee and others; and

WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson was the commission liaison to the Director of Equalization office; the Community Health Nurse's office; and the Highway 52 Corridor Committee; and

WHEREAS, the voters of Yankton County elected Mark E. Johnson to represent their best interests on the county commission in the general elections of 2004, 2008 and 2012; and WHEREAS, Mark E. Johnson devoted nine years to the Yankton

County Board of Commissioners; and WHEREAS, the Yankton County

Commissioners wish to thank and formally recognize Mark E. Johnson for his dedicated service to four public hearings on whether the Common Core standards should be adopted in South Dakota.

Bolin came back in 2013 with a measure that would have prohibited the adoption of any Common Core standards without the Legislature's approval. It squeezed through the 70member House without a vote to spare 36-32. The Senate Education Committee then killed it on a 6-1 vote.

Bolin planned to run this vear for the Republican nomination would gain this much for state school and public lands lot of energy behind commissioners. He set aside his campaign so he could focus on fighting Common Core.

Likewise state Education Secretary Melody Schopp ramped up her efforts in defense of the change to Common Core. Schopp started meeting with legislators one on one and in small groups. When Common Core opponents held public meetings, she began seeking opportunities to attend and speak in rebuttal. Standards aren't new to South Dakota schools. The Legislature ordered their establishment in 1997. The point Schopp has repeatedly tried to make is Common Core doesn't dictate how school districts establish curriculum to meet the standards. Nor is Common Core universal. South Dakota's science standards will remain in place, and will be the subject of several assessments during a student's years of school, even after the switch to Common Core for math and language. Kelly Neill, the Elkton K-12 principal, covered the change to Common Core in the school district's December newsletter.

"The books used and the lessons planned are "I never dreamed it determined by your child's traction. There's a teacher. Our teachers know the this. There really is." standards, which is very JIM BOLIN important.

> But even more important, they know our students," Neill wrote.

Republicans control both chambers of the Legislature, with House Republicans more aligned against Common Core and Senate Republicans — and most Democrats overall — so far more willing to accept the new system.

The state board adopted the switch to Common Core during the last year of then-Gov. Mike Rounds' administration. His successor, Gov. Dennis Daugaard, has stayed with the plan.

Both are Republicans, and both are running for election this year - Daugaard for a second term, Rounds for the Republican nomination for U.S. Senate ---- as Common Core opponents who are mostly Republicans seem to be at a new peak of strength.

South Dakotans on opposite sides of the issue saw Indiana legislators pass a law in 2013 that halted Common Core activity while public meetings are held and government officials conduct evaluations of the standards.

Bolin said he expects similar legislation to be attempted in South Dakota this year, although he said he won't be its lead sponsor. He said there is discussion too about legislation that tries to limit or prevent sharing of student data.

'There's going to be stuff that goes beyond anything Jim Bolin has brought," Bolin said.

He plans to introduce legislation that would establish ground rules for additional public hearings if additional Common Core standards are sought for South Dakota and to allow parents to opt-out their children from taking the Smarter Balanced assessments.

He said he's also looking at providing exemptions for non-public schools.

"My goal starting back in 2011 was to limit the scope of this," Bolin said.

While much of the political activity against Common Core in South Dakota has come from conservatives, he said liberals are revved up against it in other states.

"People feel they're losing control of every aspect of life," Bolin said.

Garry Moore went with Jerry Smith.

Immediately following the vote, Harper was sworn onto the commission.

He said after the meeting that he expects the proposed Dakota Plains shuttle loading grain facility will be a big issue in the coming year. "When you look at (that project at Napa Junction), we're right back to roads again," Harper added. "Roads have been a major problem for a lot of counties, and especially Yankton County, because of where the expansion in Yankton County has taken place. The gap between the city and where a lot of the expansion out at the lake has taken place has created a lot of the road issues. I don't have an answer for them right now, but I'd be willing to work towards trying to find them." Jensen said he is happy to have Harper on the commission despite voting for another candidate.

"John is a very intelligent man," he stated. "He's been on the Planning Commission for 10 years. He knows a lot about zoning.

In other business Tuesday, the commission:

• unanimously selected Jensen to serve another year as chairman of the board. Sinclair was elected to the vice chairman position;

 accepted the resignation of Yankton County 4-H Youth Development Coordinator Lauren Fosheim. It was followed by a discussion with South Dakota State University Extension officials about possibilities for staffing 4-H in the future. Currently, Yankton County employs not only a coordinator but pays a portion of the salary for a 4-H educator that is hired by Extension and is shared with Bon Homme and Clay counties. While some commissioners expressed satisfaction with the current arrangement, it was decided that feedback will be gathered from 4-H leadership in the county and from the two neighboring counties before determining how to proceed;

• approved two broadband initiative grants. A $7,609 local government grant will provide a new server and Internet access points for the Yankton County Government Center. The county will have $4,900 in matching costs for the grant. A $4,862 public safety grant will provide a new server and other technological infrastructure for the Yankton County Emergency Management Department. The county will have matching costs of $2,650 for that grant; and approved up to $10,000 in expenditures for L&S Electric, which is doing electrical work on a courtroom in the Yankton County Courthouse and Safety Center that is being finished. It is hoped the area will be ready for use in the spring.

Each candidate was given five minutes Tuesday to make their case to the commission. Kettering and Kenney were unable to attend.

share the couple's belief in the future of farming. "I'm a third-generation farm, and my son is a fourthgeneration farmer," Miiller said. "We raise beef cattle and crops, and we have a few chickens.

Miiller, a widower, represents a generational link to maintaining the family farm.

"My father is semi-retired farmer, and he helps out with the farming operation," he said. "I run the farm and have two sons who are 18 and 16 (years old). My older son is attending MTI (Mitchell Technical Institute) and helping on the farm while he goes to school.'

Sorensen has pursued a nursing career. However, a sibling has guaranteed the farm — which consists of crops and livestock - will remain in the family.

"My brother is 39, and he is a third-generation farmer. Now, his boys are following in his footsteps," she said. "They keep the farm going." But that's not always the case, Sorensen said.

"There isn't always a family member to take over the farm," she noted. "You always hope that one of the children will keep the farm going. You don't want to give up the land."

Sometimes, Mother Nature delivers a gut-wrenching blow that sends producers reeling and threatens their existence.

Miiller said his late wife's father has friends living in the Hot Springs area of southwestern South Dakota. Those ranchers first suffered from drought. Then, they lost much of their herds during last October's historic blizzards that dumped four to five feet of snow on western South Dakota and claimed thousands of cattle. Still, farmers and ranchers haven't given up hope, Miiller said.

"My friends and neighbors run diversified operations, and they are optimistic about the future of farming," he said.

He points to the higher corn and soybean prices in recent years. In particular, he noted that he has seen rising corn prices because of the ethanol plant in Davison County, near Mitchell. "Ethanol has really made corn prices go up in our area," he said, adding that the by-product of distillers grain is used for livestock feed

Miiller said the inability to pass a federal farm bill hasn't greatly affected his 800-acre operation. Whatever form the farm bill takes, he sees an increased emphasis on crop insurance rather than the government's direct payments to producers.

Miiller holds another reason for remaining optimistic about agriculture's future. He pointed to his son and other young people who are pursuing ag-related education in order to return to the farm or to enter agri-business

"My son's class (at MTI) has West River students who want to major in agriculture and go back to work on their ranch," he said. "They have programs with more than 60 students, compared to when I attended 20 years ago and had only eight students in some of my classes. But we were also coming off the farm crisis of the 1980s. Things are a lot better now."

MTI has relocated to a campus on the southern edge of Mitchell and has even built a housing complex to accommodate the growing number of students, Miiller said.

My son received a call, asking if he was sure that he would be attending the school because there was a waiting list in his program," he said

Sorensen noted that students in ag-related fields are finding jobs, which fuels interest in the farm and ranch sector.

Miiller sees more young people, including young families, staying or returning to rural areas because of the quality of life and opportunities

The growing world demand for U.S. food products should fuel production, Miiller said. He pointed to foreign trade deals for American corn and soybeans, along with a growing foreign demand for U.S. meat and other protein.

'Everyone needs to eat, and we can adjust the product," he said.

The first phase will cost approximately $71 million, with the second phase expected to cost slightly less, Hornstra said. B&H Wind is currently seeking an equity partner to help finance the project and possible future expansion, he said.

B&H Wind also has contracted a Minnesota-based developer for the engineering aspect of the project. The tur-
