meeting. The uses for which BID revenue can be used is spelled out in South Dakota Codified Law 9-55-3. "I think the crux of the group feels the rest of the money (not used for marketing) ought to be saved for quite a bit bigger projects than $100,000 a year is going to provide for," said Rob Stephenson, chairman of the board. With almost a year since the BID was officially created, he feels the board generally knows the direction it would like to proceed. "For the most part, we've established our policies going forward," Stephenson said. "The only big thing we have left to do is to figure out what to do in the long term. At some date, do we look at a bond for a big project?"

Core

The state Board of Education decided in November 2010 to switch to Common Core. The National Governors Association and the chief school officers association established the new standards. Bolin said those groups weren't the real force behind the standards. He said it was education central planners. His resolution called for the state board to develop a plan by mid-2017 to replace Common Core. It also said the board shouldn't adopt any additional Common Core standards in other subjects or any other national standards. The resolution, HCR 1008, didn't have any binding authority but would have stood as a statement of legislative intent. A resolution doesn't require any action by the

S.D. Legislative Panel Endorses School Aid Boost

BY CHET BROKAW
Associated Press

PIERRE — School districts won the first round Wednesday in their battle to persuade the South Dakota Legislature to provide extra state financial aid that educators say is needed to help them recover from state budget cuts imposed three years ago.

The House Education Committee voted 13-2 to endorse the school financing measure and send it to the Joint Appropriations Committee, which will determine whether the state can afford to give schools more money than Gov. Dennis Daugaard has recommended.

Wade Pogany, director of the Associated School Boards of South Dakota, said school districts are struggling to provide programs and services that students need. Schools cut some classes and programs after the budget cuts, and they are having trouble recruiting and keeping good teachers because of low salaries, he said.

The Republican governor's proposed budget would boost state aid to schools by 3 percent next year, nearly double the inflationary increase required by law. But groups representing school districts are asking the Legislature to instead provide a 3.8 percent increase, which would put spending per student back where it was before budget cuts were made in 2011.

The 3.8 percent boost, which was proposed by a legislative study panel that met last summer, would require the state to spend $5.3 million more than the governor has recommended.

But Jim Terwilliger of the state Bureau of Finance and Management said projected state revenues for next year would not cover the extra $5.3 million in spending.

If spending is boosted 3.8 percent for schools, the Legislature probably would follow tradition and give the same increase to state employee salaries and facilities that provide medical care to poor people in the Medicaid program, Terwilliger said. Increases for state employees and Medicaid providers would cost more money, he said.

Daugaard's plan would set spending per student from state and local funds at $4,764 next year. School districts want it raised to $4,805, the level in place before the 2011 cuts.

A final decision on state aid to schools likely won't be made until the Legislature passes a state budget in March.

said 33 tribes were recognized at the Washington ceremony for their code talkers.

"When a nation called upon our young soldiers during the world wars, they gave freely of this language," he said of the code talkers. "The United States used other codes, but the enemy always managed to break those codes. At the Capitol ceremony, we learned those codes, the language that our people spoke, not one single time was it ever broken. You heard talk about the hundreds and thousands, the good many lives, that were saved as a result of these (code talkers') actions."

At the Washington ceremony, the nation learned more about the code talkers, Heth said.

"There's a feeling that welled up inside, you were so proud. I can't find all the words to describe how it made me feel," he said. "We who are Natives to this country, we did (the mission) for our people and for our land."

Wednesday's ceremony included letters from U.S. Sens. Tim Johnson and John Thune of South Dakota. Remarks and greetings were also presented by Larry Zimmerman, secretary of the South Dakota Department of Military and Veterans Affairs, and Don Dahlin, senior State Vice Commander of the VFW. Dahlin, who showed a picture of Eddy receiving the gold medal for the Yankton Sioux Tribe, spoke of the long overdue recognition for the code talkers.

"These men's service and their language were tactics that saved numbers of lives during World War I and World War II. But this was a secret to the general public for more than 50 years," Dahlin said.

Wednesday's ceremony included the veterans' grand entry, the grand entry song by the Rising Hail Singers of Marty, the flag song performed by the Yankton Sioux Singers of Lake Andes and the prayer led by Willard Bruguiere.

The program concluded with the Wiping of the Tears ceremony, led by Galen Drapeau Jr., and the presentation of star quilts to Drapeau and Dahlin.

Wesley Allen Hare Jr., the master of ceremonies, noted the historic significance of Wednesday's ceremony. He stressed the importance of recognizing the code talkers at home, before their family and friends, as well as in Washington.

"We may never see this again in our lifetimes," he said.
