understanding public policy issues like poverty. The simulation gave them a chance to voice their opinions and thoughts, something they may be laughed at or not taken seriously for at their schools back home.

"You don't realize how much they can understand," Ragatz said. "They have such enthusiasm."

Organizers for the South Dakota Youth Congress agreed that students do very well with public policy topics. While this year's theme is poverty, past topics have included energy and education.

"They're coming in with a blank slate," said John Usera, Ph.D., one of the primary organizers for the event. "It's about getting good, accurate information before you make a good decision."

"It's really, really powerful. They have a perspective that is unbiased from what adults bring to the table," he added.

Students who take part in the conference are probably already leaders in their schools and communities, said DeVee Dietz, another organizer for the S.D. Youth Congress. Part of their job is to return to their homes, and apply what they learned to their families, school and community.

Usera said the S.D. Youth Congress has been a viable and important part of the state's history since forming in 1998.

"If you look at the students who've taken part in it before, you can see they've taken (leadership) roles today," he said. Past SD Youth Congress attendees have gone on to graduate school and have worked as legislative pages.

Dietz said that every student gets something out of the Youth Congress weekend, but this year's poverty simulation, facilitated by Barbara Garcia of the Community Development Division of the City of Rapid City, was something special, and unlike anything they've ever done before.

The simulation was designed to sensitize those who frequently deal with low-income families, as well as to create a broader awareness of the realities of poverty among policymakers and community leaders, Dietz said.

"They really live the life of what they'll be looking into," she added. Following the simulation, students discussed how they dealt with living in poverty and what can be done to make the situation, in real-life, easier.

"They walk away with a set of skills on how to talk in a different way," Usera said. "Instead of a debate mentality, they leave with a deliberation mentality. Debate is about winning, and deliberation is about coming to a consensus."

The afternoon poverty simulation was hosted by the South Dakota Youth Congress under the Chiesman Center for Democracy, W.O. Farber Center and the USD School of Law.

The conference, made up for 16 students, is stationed in Vermillion through Friday, July 30. For more information about the South Dakota Youth Congress, go to www.chiesman.org.

"It's the part we were worried about. This is a big relief for us," she said.

At a Home Depot in west Phoenix, where day-laborers gather to look for work, Carlos Gutierrez said he was elated when a stranger drove by and yelled the news: "They threw out the law! You guys can work!"

"I felt good inside" said the 32-year-old illegal immigrant, who came here six years ago from Sonora, Mexico, and supports his wife and three children. "Now there's a way to stay here with less problems."

Opponents argued the law will lead to racial profiling, conflict with federal immigration law and distract local police from fighting more serious crimes. The U.S. Justice Department, civil rights groups and a Phoenix police officer asked for Wednesday's injunction.

Lawyers for the state contend the law was a constitutionally sound attempt by Arizona to assist federal immigration agents and lessen border woes, such as the heavy costs for educating, jailing and providing health care for illegal immigrants.

They said Arizona shouldn't have to suffer from a broken immigration system when it has 15,000 officers who can arrest illegal immigrants.

In her ruling, Bolton said the interests of Arizona, the busiest U.S. gateway for illegal immigrants, match those of the federal government. But, she wrote, that the federal government must take the lead on deciding how to enforce immigration laws.
