Heat

through a mesh of water-soaked fibers. But it only cools half of the trailer, and when the heat climbs above 100, not even that. "When it gets really hot, we turn on the fans and stay inside," Salazar said. Going to a library or a mall to keep cool is not an option because the car doesn't have air conditioning. "So getting there is even worse than just staying inside, not moving," she added. In downtown Minneapolis, where the heat index reached 106 degrees, the Salvation Army's Harbor Light Center threw open its doors for anyone who needed to cool off and drink a glass of ice water. Executive Director Bill Miller said he allowed about 200 people who slept at the shelter Sunday night to stay instead being asked to leave in the morning. "We don't have them leave when it's this hot," he said. "It's hot enough to get dehydrated, especially if you're drinking. In this heat, it could kill you." Betty Jean Horlacher-Bainbridge-Roswell slept at the center Sunday night before venturing out into the heat Monday morning. She was six blocks away when she was nearly overcome.
