dent, and they will also be required to take half of their coursework in the core, and the other half in electives and specialization.

Aaric Willard, from Yankton, is transferring to USD because of the new program. He said it's the only university in a four-or five-state region that has it, and feels it will be an impressive major.

"When I was majoring in Interior Design at SDSU, sustainability was always the main focus," Willard said. "I thought it would be a really good idea to look into, and then I found out USD had a program for it."

Willard said Sustainability can no longer be ignored, which will hopefully give him a stable career choice.

"It's a great program to bring to USD, especially since it's a liberal arts school," he said. "Since we're the only university within a big region that has it, I think it will draw in a whole bunch of people."

Sustainability is an emerging and developing field, Haddad said, and it's not yet clear, nationally, how it's going to manage its priorities over the next few decades.

With the flexibility to choose the electives on their own, students will be able to craft their own program so that they're well prepared to deal with what they want to do with a Sustainability major, she said.

"The students need to have a common foundation, and that's what those core requirements are," Haddad said. "Beyond that, if they are really focused on the sciences for example, they need to be able to make selections within Sustainability that reflect that. Or, if what they really want to do is focused more on public communication about Sustainability, then they should be able to choose more policy, communications, contemporary media and journalism and public relations classes so they're well prepared to work in that area."

Willard said he will be going into the Human Sciences because he still wants to deal with interior design, but wants to be a green advocate for things like city planning.

"For what my specialization will be, it'll focus on developing plans to building houses and cities in the greenest way possible, and leaving the smallest carbon footprint as far as how they obtain the materials and how they build it," he said. "It sounds like it's going to be a really strong major and it was a great program to bring to the university."

• The replica of the first school to be built in Dakota Territory more than 100 years ago is authentic except for the roof. The original roof was of sod, which was considered impractical when the replica was built by Frank Hatwan, to whom the structure is dedicated on the plaque.
