Lindenwood U.: No Apologies For Unusual Striped Field Turf

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Tiny Lindenwood University has tackled the challenge of making its stadium unforgettable in its first year of college football.

For good or bad, the newly installed striped football field did the trick.

On the Belleville, Ill., campus that once was a high school, the school has created an online buzz over the turf's maroon and gray striping that has drawn equally alternating ridicule for its garishness and respect for the boldness. It makes the program one of the few with turf that's not traditional green.

That attention reached an apex this week, when a Yahoo! Sports columnist blogged that the 3,000-student Lindenwood campus' field installed as part of its $2.3-million makeover of the 4,200-seat stadium "is an abomination to the game."

"It looks like a flattened out barbershop pole. What happened to good ol' green?" Graham Watson wrote, pointing out that the playing surface "will surely set the Lynx apart from any other team in the entirety of college football."

Lindenwood administrator Jerry Bladdick, that's always been the intent the moment the school's athletics director approached him last year with the idea of throwing out conformity when it came to turf. The president of the main campus in St. Charles, Mo., signed off on the plan Bladdick said works into the school's "branding mission."

"This university doesn't aspire to be like any other university, on the academic front or the athletic front," said Bladdick, the vice president and chief administrator.
