Southwest Braces For More Sizzling Temperatures

LAS VEGAS (AP) — High temperatures brought discomfort to much of the Southwest on Sunday as many parts of the region were coming off several record-breaking heat days and bracing for more sizzling temperatures.

The National Weather Service's thermometer recorded a peak temperature of 128 derees in Death Valley National Park, which ties the record for the hottest June day anywhere in the country. However, the Los Angeles Times reports that the National Park Service thermometer — 200 yards away - recorded a temperature of 129.9, which shatters the record for June.

In Las Vegas, the mercury shot up to 117 degrees on Sunday to tie the city's record high and to cause more discomfort for residents and tourists in the sprawling desert city.

Since record-keeping began in Las Vegas in 1937, the only other times the temperature reached 117 degrees were on July 19, 2005, and July 24, 1942, according to the National Weather Service.

could go farther here, but let's wait and see," said Kermit Roosevelt, a University of Pennsylvania law professor and former high court law

But Roberts can move the court no farther to the right than Kennedy is willing to go.

Divisive civil rights cases dominated the high court's work in the past nine months, including a challenge to affirmative action in higher education that ended in a compromise ruling.

The second gay marriage case, involving California's constitutional ban on samesex marriage, also produced something of a compromise. It ended in a technical, legal ruling that clears the way for same-sex unions in California, but said nothing about a constitutional right to marriage. The justices also delivered important victories for business in cases that limited class-action claims and lawsuits over international human rights abuses, allowed authorities to collect DNA from people they arrest, ruled that human genes cannot be patented and called into question agreements between pharmaceutical companies that delay the entry of cheaper generic drugs on the market.

The timing of the voting rights and gay marriage decisions was not planned, but was perhaps inevitable, because the court's toughest cases typically are the last ones resolved before the justices take a long summer

Last Tuesday, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wondered what had happened to the court's "usual restraint" in the voting rights case. On Wednesday, Justice Antonin Scalia said society's debate about marriage should "be settled democratically rather than by judicial command.

Paul Clement, a former Bush administration official who argued that the federal marriage law should be upheld, said what links those two cases, apart from Kennedy's vote, is the idea that Congress did not give sufficient respect to states.

It subjected some states to strict federal oversight of elections based on old data rather than current conditions, Roberts said in the voting rights case. Congress made second-class citizens of same-sex couples in denying them federal benefits even after states extended them the right to marry, Kennedy said in the gay marriage case

"It's certainly the thread that united the votes of Justice Kennedy in the DOMA case and the voting rights case," Clement said.

Roberts first expressed reservations about the voting rights law when he was a young lawyer in the Reagan White House. A debate was then taking place in Congress about extending the law's key requirement that states with a history of racial discrimination in voting get Washington's approval before changing the way they hold elections. This "preclearance" provision, often called a crown jewel of civil rights law, was enormously effective in heading off the creative ways some states devised to keep minorities from voting.

When the justices looked at the voting rights law four vears ago in a case from Texas. Roberts wrote a consensus opinion that pointedly criticized the law as being focused on past problems, but he sidestepped the larger question that the court now has emphatically answered. The affirmative action decision ordered lower courts to cast a more skeptical eve on college admissions programs, but did not throw out the University of Texas program that was being challenged. Nor did it make a major pronouncement about affirmative action.

But it may have set the stage for a more consequential ruling in future years, in much the way that the court's voting rights decision flows from its 2009 case.

In the affirmative action case, seven justices formed the majority, including the unlikely pair of justices who have benefited from affirmative action, Sonia Sotomayor and Clarence Thomas. Šotomayor has spoken positively of affirmative action, while Thomas has been an unyielding critic who has voted to ban all racial preferences.

Their agreement in the Texas case should not mask a deep division on the court about the validity of race-conscious admissions programs.

The court's business cases predictably took a back seat to the run of high-profile civil rights cases. But the business cases show a court that has steadily made it harder for plaintiffs to band together in class actions that can be more efficient and lucrative for plaintiffs, but much more expensive for companies that most often are the defendants in such claims.

driving in the state.

"This year, there were four bills submitted to the Legislature, and one ended up passing," Cochran said.
"The bill that passed bans teenagers under age 16 from using electronic devices while driving. Research has shown that distracted driving for teens is a big cause of collision and I think having a stronger driver education program would help impact

She added that she hopes the three bills that were not passed during this legislative session are introduced again and get another review.

Despite the poor ranking in child and teen deaths, Cochran said South Dakota fares well in other categories.

"Something that bodes well for the state is that we rank third in economic wellbeing in the nation," she said. "Also, teens not working and not in school also dropped from 6 percent in 2008 to 5 percent in 2011. This could be due to a policy change that mandates school attendance in the state up until age 18."

The health domain ranking for South Dakota also rose from last year.

The state currently ranks 38th in the nation in the health categories, but improved in children without insurance and teens who abuse drugs or alcohol.

South Dakota did not experience any rank change for children in poverty.

One thing Cochran said to keep an eye on is low birth weight babies in the state. Between 2005 and 2010, the number rose from 6.6 percent to 6.8 percent. Although she said this is a thing to keep an eye on.

Cochran added that she is concerned about fourth graders not being proficient in reading. In 2005, 66 percent of fourth graders were not proficient, dropping to
