core constituents, while liberal lawmakers were keenly aware that they contained dollars for food assistance that largely went to their bedrock voters in big cities. Each party needed the other to pass the measure that melded both farm and food money, and it almost always passed with bipartisan support.

But this year, when House Speaker John Boehner urged lawmakers to support the bill and put it up for a vote, it failed to get enough support, shocking longtime congressional observers and lawmakers alike. Tea party-backed conservatives refused to budge in their demands for even deeper cuts to the food stamp program, which has doubled in cost over the last five years to almost $80 billion annually and now helps feed 1 in 7 Americans.

The House version already had proposed slashing the $955 billion version of the bill that the Democratic-controlled Senate had passed by $20.5 billion in food-stamp cuts. That wasn't enough for some Republicans and their allies, who were looking ahead to the 2014 midterm congressional elections and worried about the impact of supporting the measure.

"I can't imagine being a Republican and asking primary audiences for their vote when you just voted for this debacle," said Americans for Prosperity President Tim Phillips. "It's impossible to justify, no matter where you are from."

Lawmakers like Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., who voted for the $600-billion farm bill in 2008, were clearly mindful that they would be inviting this type of criticism if they backed this year's measure. The congressman, who often talks about his district's tobacco, cotton and soybean production, chose not to take that chance. He voted against the bill after Americans for Prosperity targeted him with radio ads and an email push and a smile the entire time and it worked out in my favor," Dee said. "I really enjoy the service work that we do, and I really want to instill the value of reading to children at a young age."

Dee is also working with Children's Miracle Network now. She helps raise funds for the organization and reads to children at the hospital.

"There's a lot of service work, and that's what I enjoy about being Miss South Dakota," Dee said.

Now that she has been crowned Miss South Dakota, Dee said her days are already busy. She is now focusing on preparing for the Miss America competition, which will be held in September.

"I haven't had much time to think about anything — once I was crowned Miss South Dakota, I got straight to work," Dee said. "My paper-work is due in a couple weeks for Miss America, and it's all going really fast right now."

Just graduating from the University of South Dakota this May, Dee will now work at Miss South Dakota for a year until she plans to continue her education to work in physical therapy. Dee graduated from USD with a major in health sciences and a minor in psychology, and she plans to obtain her Master's degree in kiniseology and then attend physical therapy school.

Dee said she is proud to be able to represent not only her hometown of Mitchell and the University of South Dakota, but the entire state as well.

"I'm a South Dakota girl born and raised, so it's amazing to have all the hometown support that I have received," she said. "It's a truly humbling experience to be chosen out of 15 other beautiful, intelligent, unique women. I'm so happy to be able to be the representative for the year and South Dakota's representative as well."

That job is something Dee said she isn't taking lightly. "There were 16 contestants this year, including myself, and to be chosen as Miss South Dakota from such an outstanding group is really a humbling experience," she said. "When my name was called as Miss South Dakota, I was in complete shock. You prepare as much as you can and you do all you can, and for me I let God take the reins after I had done all my preparations and performed on stage. It is something I will remember for the rest of my life."

The Miss America Pageant will be held in Atlantic City, NJ September 15.
