“The question still is how this works, what we have to pay and what are the options,” Owen said. “This is before the question of whether the law is good or bad. It’s just in terms of whether we’re going to be able to understand it.”

The one-year reprieve is only for businesses. Individuals still must have insurance by 2014 or face penalties, and new online marketplaces called exchanges will help them find coverage, often at subsidized rates.

Cathy McLeer, associate state director of AARP South Dakota, which supports the Affordable Care Act, said the new law’s benefits outweigh its challenges. She said the law already has expanded coverage for children and young adults, provided free preventive health screenings for some people on Medicare and saved many people on Medicare money on prescriptions.

“Yes, it’s very complicated, and yes, it’s going to take time to implement it and figure it out. The bottom line is real people in South Dakota are benefiting from provisions already in place,” McLeer said. Tom Walsh, CEO of Dakota King, which has 1,100 employees at 37 Burger King restaurants in three states, said about 90 percent of his managers and 50 percent of his hourly employees enroll in the company’s group insurance plan by contributing part of their paycheck.

The health overhaul law would no longer give employees a choice, Walsh said.

“Now we must offer it to people who haven’t wanted insurance. A lot of young people we employ are more interested in cash than some of the benefits,” he said.

terim president.

In his inaugural speech, broadcast nationwide, he said the anti-Morsi protests that began June 30 had “corrected the path of the glorious revolution of Jan. 25,” referring to the 2011 uprising that toppled Mubarak.

To cheers from his audience, he also praised the army, police, media and judiciary for standing against the Brotherhood. Islamists saw those institutions as full of Mubarak loyalists trying to thwart their rule.

Furious over what it calls a military coup against democracy, the Brotherhood said it would not work with the new leadership. It and harder-line Islamist allies called for a wave of protests Friday, dubbing it the “Friday of Rage,” vowing to escalate if the military does not back down.

There are widespread fears of Islamist violence in retaliation for Morsi’s ouster, and already some former militant extremists have vowed to fight.

Suspected militants opened fire at four sites in northern Sinai, targeting two military checkpoints, a police station and el-Arish airport, where military aircraft are stationed, security officials said. The military and security responded to the attacks but there was no word on casualties in the ongoing clashes.

Multiple officials of the Brotherhood firmly urged their followers to keep their protests peaceful. Thousands of Morsi supporters remained massed in front of a Cairo mosque where they have camped for days, with line of military armored vehicles across the road keeping watch.

“We declare our complete rejection of the military coup staged against the elected president and the will of the nation,” the Brotherhood said in a statement, read by senior cleric Abdel-Rahman el-Barr to the crowd outside the Rabia al-Adawiya Mosque in Cairo.

“We refuse to participate in any activities with the usurping authorities,” the statement said, urging Morsi supporters to remain peaceful. The Rabia al-Adawiya protesters planned to march Friday to the Ministry of Defense.

The Brotherhood denounced the crackdown, including the shutdown Wednesday night of its television channel, Mistr25, its newspaper and three pro-Morsi Islamist TV stations. The military, it said, is returning Egypt to the practices of “the dark, repressive, dictatorial and corrupt ages.”

A military statement late Thursday appeared to signal a wider wave of arrests was not in the offing. A spokesman, Col. Ahmed Mohammed Ali, said in a Facebook posting that that the army and security forces will not take “any exceptional or arbitrary measures” against any political group.

The military has a “strong will to ensure national reconciliation, constructive justice and tolerance,” he wrote. He spoke against “gloating” and vengeance, saying only peaceful protests will be tolerated and urging Egyptians not to attack Brotherhood offices to avert an “endless cycle of revenge.”

The army’s removal of Morsi sparked massive celebrations Wednesday night among the crowds of protesters around the country, with fireworks, dancing and blaring car horns lasting close to dawn.

The constitution, which Islamists drafted and Morsi praised as the greatest in the world, has been suspended. Also, Abdel-Meguid Mahmoud, the Mubarak-era top prosecutor whom Morsi removed to much controversy, was reinstated to his post and immediately announced investigations against Brotherhood officials.

Many of the Brotherhood’s opponents want them prosecuted for what they say were crimes committed during Morsi’s rule, just as Mubarak was prosecuted for protester deaths during the 2011 uprising. In the past year, dozens were killed in clashes with Brotherhood supporters and with security forces.

But the swift moves raise perceptions of a revenge campaign against the Brotherhood.

The National Salvation Front, the top opposition political group during Morsi’s presidency and a key member of the coalition that worked with the military in his removal, criticized the moves, saying, “We totally reject excluding any party, particularly political Islamic groups.”

The Front has proposed one of its top leaders, Mohammed ElBaradei, to become prime minister of the interim Cabinet, a post that will hold strong powers since Mansour’s presidency post is considered symbolic. ElBaradei, a Nobel Peace laureate who once headed the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, is considered Egypt’s top reform advocate.

Scherschligt to provide support for the team, Lammers added.

“When I was the director, there were weeks when I would spend 10-plus hours doing stuff for Search and Rescue, and that wasn’t nearly enough a lot of the time. It’s great to have someone in the office,” he said. “I’ve worked with Paul on various things, and I have total faith in his abilities.”

By being a part of county government, Scherschligt said the team will have access to funding sources such as the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Department of Homeland Security.

“It makes the organization more stable,” he stated. “The big thing right now is, they are the only local unit that can do water rescue stuff. We want to make sure they stay in existence.”
